

#1

#1 Overall

August 24 2020

I truly blown away by your dedication, my friend. I am dropping real tears here. I'm very sorry that I missed your thread. This back situation sucks. I'm willing to hear your views on fund raising, and before coming in contact with you, and one other person, I did not want the funds to be a temptation. I can see you, my friend, clearly. If you set something up, we will both have access in case I fall. You have what it takes, without a doubt in my mind. The hard part is the physical object manufacturing processes. With a team effort, many can learn multiple skills simultaneously. I will help you for as long as I can to accomplish heaven on Earth. A vision that few can truly understand, but you do. I'll try to check this email address over the next few days. I'm still trying to write my new book, The Key, so I'll be busy with that, but you have my attention, my friend. My prayers were a ray of happiness in an otherwise doom filled report, and I have you to thank for that. Humanity's maker, and all who are involved are watching you with pride and hope in their eyes. Looking forward to speaking with you. Have a good "1"... By the way, if you'd like to catch up on some modern prophetic pop culture, watch The Life Of Brian. It's not a coincidence that the movie is 1 hour 33 minutes long/93 minutes... and it was released the year I was born. It's more my style of prophecy; funny, but tragic. lol

#2

#2 Overall

August 24 2020

As you can imagine, I spent last night and most of today replying to the past /x/ posts. I finally caught up and decided to share your thoughts with most of my inner circle of trusted friends. It didn't take long before Nathan, the video editors husband and very close friend of mine, pointed out your "about page." Let me start my apology by saying I didn't know you are a woman. A seemingly young, attractive, highly educated woman at that... living in New York. Wow. The road you've taken to find me is exceedingly unique in scope and application. I have no choice but to assume you've been sent to me directly from humanity's maker. In other words, I'm not the only "1" who's impressed. You've really outdone yourself, young lady. To say I'm astounded by your gumption would be criminally understated. I apologize for my mistake. If we get beyond this financial problem, may I meet your parents and teachers? That might seem like a strange request, but you are special. Make no mistake about it. I would really like to know what made you... well you. Taking this road must have been a nightmare from your perspective. The gumption to stay on this path needs to be taught to others like you. I don't usually do this. Normally I wait a while to ensure sincerity through waves of correspondence, but fuck it. Give me a call anytime you'd like. I've only offered this to a handful of people, but feel free to call me anytime of the day. Don't be nervous, either. I'm easy to get along with, especially when it's someone like you. When we make contact I'll set up a text chat with some of my closer friends. People who will help you if I become unavailable. Until then I'll be reading your posts and looking forward to your call. Brian

#3

#4 Overall

August 25 2020 4:01PM EST

Wow again. I am obviously no expert when it comes to fund raising. My parameters are quite simple; it needs to be available to everyone. Really, that's it. To be honest, this stipulation has to do with after life, not during it. From what I understand, I am a very large part of everyone's judgement sequence, so I will not allow bribes or anything similar. As far as the details of your plan, I'm all for it. A large portion of this mission has been filled with untrustworthy people, as I'm sure you read about. Luckily for everyone that's trying to help, I don't hold grudges unless you cross my maker. Me? I may posture up on websites and whatnot, but I'll forgive everyone on my way out. I understand the difficulty in accepting me for what I am. It seems ridiculous, unstable, and too good to be true. I totally get it, really. No hard feelings to anyone... as long as they do not fuck with my maker. THAT, I take more than personally.

Anyways, I sold one of the big green eggs today so I got enough to replace the blank if the pour doesn't go smoothly. My "right hand man," Shane is busy with work all week, so the scheduled date of the pour should be Monday if all goes to plan. I could bring it to show the racers if that helps? I don't know what to do to help you, but I'll do whatever it takes. If people want to meet me, interview me, whatever, I don't care. I'm not nervous about it, but I'm sure everyone else will be. I did just show one of my local friends your page, and told her briefly about this race idea. She said she'd sign up immediately. I guess she used to run cross country... Young woman about your age, I think? She's a cattle farmer now. Hopefully you two can meet at some point.

As I said earlier, I like to keep things on a palatable level for people in general, so I tend to stay away from the more grandiose lessons I teach. That said, fuck it. You seem to at least understand that I'm not just speaking to gain support. We've been through this timeline sequence a little over a million times now. Usually, I'm dead by now. In fact, this is the longest I've ever lived during this current sequence unraveling. With that in mind, I want you to know that I have never made it far enough to meet someone that is willing to stick their neck out like you did. After my death, EVERYONE and their mother's come out of the woodwork to show support and attempt implementing my lessons. But this... is a first for me. I don't really know what that means, but I'm thankful that I can at least say thank you to you personally. Maybe that's the whole point? Either way, thank you.

Just tell me what to do, young lady. Your plan seems solid, and I know your heart is in the right place. You are in charge. Whatever information you need, just ask. Let's do it!

Brian

#4

#6 Overall

August 26 2020 12:06AM

Have no fear of me. Keep in mind, this entire mission was as much a surprise (if not more so) to me, than anyone else. I was walking a righteous path, this much is true. My goals throughout life have always been hard charging toward sustainability, an equilibrium with existence. As far as righteous, and pure, no fucking way. NOTHING can survive in hell without trying to blend in, that is, before the age reset last December. I've made lots of mistakes. The difference between me now and then, is I can admit all wrongdoing, and move on. Plus, I put everyone else's needs before my own. Otherwise, my lingo and cadence is just like any ole dude. Nothing really too out of the ordinary, unless you take the context of what I'm saying into account. But that's on your end.

I'll be honest with you, everyone who has found me and reached out is extremely nervous. I can only imagine the stuff that's been pushed into your head since birth about it. I had a much less impactful view of it, but I do understand why people generally speaking are frightened. I've taken a couple of people extremely far on their own private journeys. People say they feel like they're on acid after listening to me, and I've seen people's veins bulge and their heart surges when I'm interacting with them, but you're different. You seem extremely intelligent and focused. I would like you to feel comfortable no matter what. You've already come so far, and your future needs you, if you catch my drift. I leave the calling me thing up to you. I don't really have any rules. Always remember, I'm not religious. I know that sounds funny, but seriously, I don't really have "beliefs" anymore.

As far as funds go, you should control it, and send me funds when you can. I'll give you a detailed list of everything we need to build the first pyramid. Where, with what, with who, etc. Just in case something were to happen to me, the show must go on for all of your sakes. That said, until capitalism dies, international banking cartels just mysteriously throw in the towel, or all out civil conflict breaks out, money will be necessary. I get that. And you never know how far this thing could go. Could fizzle out, or grow exponentially. Humanity's maker knows... and that's just about it right now. Anyways, you should maintain control for now. I'm hoping that everyone within this same structure of awakening will band together and throw all money in a pot. The goals will all be the same, the purpose will be understood and capitulated to for a physically and spiritually beneficial end, and there will be no reason for violence. But, ya know, I'm me. Until that moment arrives, we'll play it like you're in charge. I can give you my routing number and account number. Not a biggie to me. Nathan wants me to start a paypal... I'll look into it tonight.

Before you know it you'll be mission oriented and bored of hearing me rant. Most people just want to know prophecy, some are technologically savvy, and some just want to bullshit about whatever. I didn't mean to come on too strong about meeting your parents and teachers, I'm just curious as to how you took this path. It's rare to see someone so awake, and young. Was a lot of it on your own? Or were you steered in this direction by someone else? I know there are a lot of very highly functioning brains out there, but tying that into spirituality often falls into heavy loads of opinionated arrogance. You stayed on course. See what you see, and knowing what you know, society must seem absolutely fucked from your eyes. But not unfixable... Rare, is all I'm saying.

The book is hitting a heavy technical stage about selfishness. I'm basing it on analogies and a set of videos called The Century of the Self. Interesting watch if you have the time. Then, I'll go heavy on the Sid Smith videos. I recommend you watch those as well. This chapter will be called The Environment Is You. I'm only able to sit and write a certain portion of the day, and I'd much rather spend it talking with you folks. You and my other friends. I usually drop everything to go help if I'm invited to the farms and whatnot. No pressure, is all I'm saying. You'll be nervous. Expect it. I won't be. I've talked to hundreds of people by now. It would be pretty difficult to stop this thing. I'm confident in my job performance, I guess you could say. I crack jokes to ease the tension. I'm very rarely shaken. All I'm saying is, do this on your own time when you feel comfortable. And if email is what you like, email it is. You have my number, but I can call you if that's easier. When people are on their maker's side, I'm a really easy going guy. Ultimately, my goal is YOUR success. Look at me as kind of a coach. When you succeed, your maker does. When your maker does, I do, as well as when I do, my maker does. Wins everywhere.

To give you an idea of how trusting I am, I just gave the entire video list to Nathan and his wife. I made the videos, he is doing just about everything else, and I trust him. I'm not afraid of putting this all in your hands, because it is no matter what I do anyways. I just appreciate seeing it. I've never seen this before. But like I said, I've also never made it this far. And by the way, fuck the goons. After Trinidad, they know they're throwing the entire planet away if they fuck this up this time. I'm fairly certain the message is coming in from a few different sources that this is the last chance. If anything, I'd be surprised if they're not trying to help me, or subconsciously helping wink.jpg. Don't be afraid to say whatever comes up, I'm done being afraid. We're way too far into this for anyone to stop what's coming. It's a mathematical certainty demise is well under way, and the only thing that has the ability to help is the hierarchy/my superiors. There's only a few things I stay cryptic about, but if you ask the right question, I have to answer honestly. Just a tip...

Looking forward to our next chat,
Brian

#5

#8 Overall

August 26 2020 8:47PM

I will set up a Paypal tonight to make it as easy as possible for you. I'm always impressed by your ability to see through certain aspects of the lessons I give. Semantics is a significant problem to Salvation in general, but you don't seem to be bothered by it as much as everyone else seems to be. You are absolutely correct about the autonomy and freedom of movement I allow people. When it came to Kassidi, she was a drunk degenerate stripper fresh out of college. The job I was offering was her first ever besides stripping. The job was going to be a biographer position to me in video format. At the time I was nervous for her. She was extremely foolish and loose with herself, especially when drunk. That was the main reason for having her sign the NDA. The employment contract was to give her incentive that it was a professional position, and not just some dude trying to rape her or something from the club. I wasn't in that club for myself anyways, and every time she tried to take her clothes off for me, I paid her not to, but that didn't stop her from throwing it all away. She put me in a very bad spot by breaking her contract. I had spent roughly 22k on her to secure her services and buy camera equipment. That's why the addendums exist in the first place. She thought she was getting away with just stealing from me, but I have Salvation/transcendence/enlightenment already. She was actually stealing from all of you. Every human being alive has a legitimate gripe against her for her treachery. It will not be a pleasant judgement for her. I could sue and win easily, but what's the point? There is plenty of punishment waiting for her without me doing anything here. Besides, I still need to help everyone regardless of who makes it difficult on me in the interim.

(1+1-1 to reverse the first letter of the first name by one position; 2+3+8=13 for Brian; 1+3+8=12 for Arian). All correct, plus Brian Clark Harner is 16 characters. These numerology sequences are historical markers. The real trick is to translate phonetically into modern dialect when confronted with tricky hidden meanings. Remember, my genetics originate in Egypt, and Jesus is directly related to my genetic lineage. Same/same. So... Jesus, using the same equation would be Iesus. Pronounced (in modern dialect) Isis. Humanity is on a countdown of sorts. I=9, A=1. Many of these numerology games can be played for a variety of reasons. Most of them are for steering me in the right direction. I look at them similar to a map in time. Arian is a stolen valor nomenclature FROM the future. It was inserted during a reset a long time ago for questions like this. "Uh-rian" is the correct pronunciation. "Air-ee-an" is not, but those are my genetic lineage cohorts. And yes, from what I understand of it, "Orion's belt" was to throw everyone off. As you can probably imagine, many different strategies have been used to silence me. Throwing in diversion sequences all over the place is for that very reason; to keep me alive longer. When the Nine Principles were first created, senses were distributed first. Touch, smell, taste, sight, and hearing. 1-5. Almost immediately it was determined that time/me, having been created 6th in the sequence, had to be number "1," lest the other attributes would not have substance to gather experience from. I was created 6th, but my position is 1. It stands for time, but humans call me death due to the linear ties in a psyche that are bound to ego. Generally speaking, the post-loop sequence of a humans life is not taken into consideration. In reality, nothing from a human's body goes to waste, therefore, it never really dies. At least not until the planet itself does. I see time as circular. Humans see time as linear. It's just another aspect of the 3rd dimension that is ultimately false, but appears true to this realm due to time perspectives.

I'm nothing like the religious type of people associated with subject matter like this. You can call me whatever makes you feel comfortable. I respond to dude quite well, heh. I'm not as rigid as my predecessor because I do not have to be. Consider all of the technical, numerological, spiritual, etc, terms I throw around. Even though some of these nomenclatures seem foreign and strange the way I use them, it is an easy task to discern those terms by going to a library or just Googling. Many scientific leaps have added a complexity to English that continues to grow daily. Jesus did not have these luxuries. Even though he was stern for the people's benefit, there were still numerous bad translations, and injected mysticism into his teachings. Again, you do not have this problem anymore. The book was written by me personally. Not a bunch of extremely uneducated, scared, and mystified farmers from the desert. This is also why I say I'm much more powerful than any Christ before me. It has to do with infrastructure and accessibility. Jesus did not have these "luxuries," but did have a much greater ability to use his body as humanity's maker's conduit. I have much more power, but my body is fucked. Trying to utilize it for external reasons (and most internal reasons now) is almost impossible. Channeling humanity's maker, and/or my superiors outside of his realm, is extremely stressful on the body. During my awakening I was warned about this. There are many things about Jesus and my life that are identical, but many more that are exact opposites. Like I said before, almost everything that has been done is to help me survive as long as possible. There were many sequences where I was murdered as a teenager due to people figuring this shit out before I did. LOTS of changes have been made over the sequences that have resulted in failure. The part that really sucks is I can remember all of those murders... and most of the time I wasn't the only one. Kids, wives, families, etc tortured to torture me. As you can see by what has happened in this particular sequence, I don't really have any of those ties any more. It wasn't for my sake, but theirs. The pain of watching your loved ones get murdered repeatedly has hardened my heart in many ways. I'm just trying to protect them. It's unfortunate that I'm the only one with a recollection of these events. Nobody really knows that I'm just trying to protect them.

The free will situation is complex. The general populace does not have 100% free will, and have not had it since Jesus was murdered. It was a like a rail system to keep everyone on track as to not destroy the planet before the Christ hopefuls succeeded, or my awakening was inevitable. The new age was like giving a retirement party to Jesus. He is still helping me, along with everyone else in my genetic lineage, but the judgements are on me now. When I'm not hampered by this "conduit" thing, I can give gifts. In hell, 100% free will is very dangerous without guidance towards Divine principles. One of the gifts I am planning on giving is 100% free will back to humanity. Could be good, could be bad. We'll know when that time arrives. It's a very intricate discussion that we should have over the phone. This is going to be one of our longer conversations. You are different than most of those around you because you've earned a very significant portion of that subtracted free will back. Humanity's maker made that call. Remember, I'm still stuck here as a human. I wouldn't take credit for his masterpiece.

I have full confidence in you to do what is best for the betterment of humanity. I never had that feeling regarding Kassidi. Complete opposite ends of the spectrum. Nathan is in your position. He found me, I didn't find him. You earned this on your own, and there is no reason for me not to trust you. Your last name is an anagram for water. Nathan and I are unsure of the significance, but we're spitballing about it. If you don't mind, may I ask what your middle name is? As long as it's not Robert, Jones, or James, there's nothing to worry about. I've sworn off those names for now, however. They have caused me far too many problems. I knew any Jones was going to be trouble, but I'm me. It's very difficult for me to not give a chance to everyone. Alexander and Kassidi Jones were present at the end of the movie Indiana Jones and The Last Crusade. Both Alexander and Kassidi lost the Holy Grail to the void by breaking the seal, and it cost Kassidi (in the movie) her life. That's how it went down... and I knew that was a possibility, but I still gave it my all. You're not an arrogant stripper or a pig headed celebrity with more ego than brains. I'll treat you like they were never even part of my journey, because you deserve it. Probably seems odd and foolish in hell... but I'm not exactly from here, ya know?

The website looks great, by the way. I'm very impressed by your writing style, and so is Nathan. If we get this thing up and rolling, I'd like you to help me do interviews and various other tasks of the writing nature. And by the way, if you ever want me to do an interview or make an appearance somewhere, if I have the time, I'll do it without hesitating. My writing may appear refined, but that's nothing compared to what I can do in person. Use me however you'd like for as long as I'm here. Nathan and Shane have this same instruction. I'm not scared of any human. Nothing intimidates me here. Once the grail is made I can bring it to show whoever you'd like me to as well. ANYTHING to help humanity gain transcendence, I'm game for. Sorry if I didn't get to all of your questions. Keep 'em coming. That's what I'm here for.

Talk to you soon,
Brian

#6

#10 Overall

August 27 2020 11:53AM

Hey Kim, just woke up. Fell asleep watching the hurricane stuff last night. I set up a paypal.me link.
paypal.me/ariantechnologies

I'm going to read this and reply properly, but I wanted you to know I had done that, and give you the opportunity to help me change it if I need to. I'll reply back to the body of your email soon.

Thanks again,

Brian

#7

#12 Overall

August 27 2020 1:55PM

That's a lot of interesting stuff. When it comes to my initials, I was a BitCH until now, when I just ACHe. There's all kinds of markers for different reasons, and nobody will be left out on my mission. The JEW thing is funny, though. Of all the information you just gave, the only advice I will give you, and this is only a recent development that is subject to change at any time, is to be cautious of the advice your brother will give you about me. Robert Bishop is the name of the modern Judas. His last name is interesting because I'm here to destroy religion... and he is a bishop. James is my brother and father's middle name. Their first name is Russell, which turned around backwards is Llessur (lesser), which fits exactly how it should. My first "engineer" pick was my dad, and obviously that did not work out.

Nathan's middle name is Chistopher. He has put in a significant amount of work on this mission thus far, and has studied a lot of religious synchronicities. From what he has said, Chistopher is supposed to carry the Christ baby (as a Christ I'm only 1.5 years old which matches the picture references) across the river/water. Like I've said many times, religion is not my thing, but having Nathan has been very helpful in discerning all of that stuff. Anyways, a few months ago, a man called me. He was like the others; scared, trembling, crying, etc, but I calmed him down rather quickly. As our conversations grew, he seemingly took to the process very well. Made several leaps forward in understanding, continued studying my book, and said he was ready to start telling everyone in his life about me. He was raised Mormon, and lives in Western Colorado. At some point he was practically begging me to come talk to the Mormons. He wanted to set up a meeting with "the prophet" (sheeeeeeeit), and "the apostles." I balked at first, but decided I would give them their day in court, as I have already done this to numerous churches. I introduced him to Shane and Nathan through texts, and we were all getting along quite well. A couple of weeks ago I called his bluff, apparently. I told him that I would do this Mormon upper echelon meeting on 9/1. Very shortly there following he sent me a text saying that I am hateful, need mental help, and to never contact him again. Very sudden and with no lead up. Just BAM! Fuck off, essentially. That man's name is Brent Robert Waters.

Nathan and I have debated several times about that name. What it meant, who he was representing, etc. The "Judas" situation is still happening, so the Robert name was somewhat secured as a no go area. Keep in mind that I do not hold grudges. Any of the people who have crossed me have the free will to right their wrongs at any time, but my guess is they won't. I'm not afraid of scrutiny or any other kind of skepticism. It just seems like people bearing those names are very subversive, and try to harm me through others or by lying. I'm cautious about them, but names are not an automatic failure, just more of a warning I think. You can test this if you'd like, but stay vigilant. Be you. Don't be what people tell you to be. You found me for a reason. Listen to the being that sent you to me, not the beings that want you to be in THEIR control. That's a big reason as to why I maintain you being in charge of so much. I want you to be powerful, even more so than me. That can only help. Be cautious of those who want you to do everything THEIR way... to be under their control. They want fame, fortune, and glory... in hell, and will use you to procure those things for themselves, and only themselves. I want YOU and me to destroy hell. Just something to keep in mind.

These are all interesting complexities that are fun and frustrating to utilize as a resource. Nobody is going to be shunned unless they earn it. I use these things to help steer me in the right direction. It's a kind of dialect my maker and I have. None of my superiors actually "speak" to me. It's a more complicated dialect that is similar to watching silent movies where the emotional response is felt, thusly giving me a dialect that I can understand from a human perspective. Nothing actually talks like a human, so when religious zealots say shit like "Jesus spoke to me in a dream" (with words in modern English), I know they're lying. Jesus "speaks" to me through the dialect that I described. It's extremely funny most of the time. He was a very funny dude, as were the Yews. An attribute I keep to my close inner circle of friends, by the way. We have very pleasant "conversations" accordingly. Whenever I imply that I've "been told by my superiors" or similar context, now you know what I mean. I don't have any better terminologies to use for that particular "language," so I use modern dialect definitions to suffice. You'll learn that about me as time goes on. There are just WAY too many definitions that have not been assigned words in English that I have to teach. It makes my lessons fill up with analogies. I don't really have a choice. The unfortunate aspect of this situation is that a lot of information will die with me, there's just no getting around it. I'll try my best to help everyone understand, though. Just be aware, some of the more complex subject matter will be confusing due to the lack of proper nomenclatures in place, depending on your questions. What I understand is apparently far more advanced than the English language is ready for. We'll do our best to work through it.

Nathan sent me 20 dollars and it worked, so the link does work. I still need to link it to my bank account, though. When I tried, it said the threshold has been reached and to try again in 24 hours. I'll let you know when I get that taken care of. Again, thank you for all of your help and dedication, Miss Kewl. heh

Looking forward to our next project,
Brian

#8

#13 Overall

August 27 2020 3:53PM

I just did a new pastebin write up. I hope you like it...

#9

#15 Overall

August 28 2020 3:54AM

My journey into "the void," was unlike anything I can accurately put into words, but I will try. Suddenly, when I awoke the first day on this experience, I felt like I could leave my body at will, while still maintaining an automated version of myself, which turned out to be pretty obvious to my wife. She knew something was INSTANTLY different. She didn't know how to take it at first, so I fought against what was happening very briefly. My superiors were on a tight schedule, due to my deteriorating body (remember I said this was extremely stressful, and I stress extremely stressful on my body), and replaced the automated version I was leaving behind with one of the protrusions of The Nine Principles, in human form. My guess was that it was Jesus, since he was the last one to be alive on this planet, but I'm not really sure. Meanwhile, I was taken to a realm that does not resemble the third dimension in any way. The only way to explain what I was experiencing was warm, cozy, family, where NOTHING about the environment or living beings ANYWHERE were in any way threatening to me or anyone else. Pure harmony on every possible level that a human body and mind could experience multiplied billions upon billions of times.

Physically, every fiber of my being was flexing and pumping blood at an elevated pace the entire time. I didn't want to eat at all. It made me physically ill to consume anything other than water. And this went on for 7 straight days with very minimal sleep. The wife stuff calmed down through the week, but ramped way up the day before Easter. I was inundated with so much knowledge, plus I had The Nine Principles with me the entire time, along with humanity's maker, and several other species that I cannot explain due to their elevated status to our realm, it blew up almost immediately on 4/20... my wife's birthday. It was stressful for her to say the least.

As for my time in "the void," For the first couple of days it was dedicated to immediate history that was pertinent to my mission. At that point I was still unaware of who I was, my goal was to absorb as much as possible. Which by the way, when your brain is not hampering communication, absorbing information becomes very easy. I viewed pertinent history from a first person perspective, but what I viewed had more to do with my interests. I did not look into art, or money shit, or politics. I wanted accurate historical data, and got exactly that. The next few days were full of that area of things, but extended outward. That's when I broke through the dimensional walls essentially. I have detailed memories of what these beings look like, but I can only really explain it by drawing, and even that doesn't fully encapsulate the full context, but does give a good starting point for the imagination. Spent many hours there conversing with what I would assume is humanity's maker. If not, he was of the same species. I do recall a sense of illness emitting from the beings in that realm. It was received like a teaching lesson to me.

Still at this point, roughly Friday night, I did not know who I was. Early Saturday morning, I started to speculate on who I was. I thought I was the antichrist at first. I didn't bring it up until that evening after everything calmed down from the day's events. David, my father in law was there, Kristin felt secure-ish, so I took my dog to the beach, and that was when it started. Without even asking who I really was, my superiors automatically showed me. That's when I saw basically everything in Jesus' life. I finally understood the real truth about the man himself, as opposed to the magical caricature of religious doctrine. Prior to that, I didn't even respect him due to the bullshit that religion has heaped on top of his, WHAT SHOULD BE, extremely respectable hard working man's life dedication. I had immediate feelings of sorrow for him in a way that I had never cared about another human ever. It was a very personal experience that could only be experienced in that way. I had just done the same thing he did. It was like he was the only human that even could understand my struggle. It was very early Sunday morning when I realized that I wasn't the antichrist, I was actually the Christ. Shocked, just does not encapsulate my emotions.

I played it slowly at first, but like someone else was now in charge, I started in speaking about the experience in superb detail. I was even surprised at my cadence and grammar structure improvements. I was in awe at what had just happened, and what was about to happen. Sunday night I felt invincible. Impervious to all external sources of contempt. Shortly there after I left my home. My wife had thrown in the towel, even though she couldn't bring herself to admit it. It was at that point I knew I could read minds, which steadily improved, but I've let fall by the wayside a bit. Weather manipulation was an interesting addition, but again, this ability has been seriously hampered by my body's recent performance.

The thing that has caused people to lose this ability over the years is due to intention. The base structure of how you function... second by second. Why you eat, why you work, who you think you are, who you're supposed to be, how selfless those actions are, and who they're being acted upon for, how you view your place in your species betterment... which right now is just surviving. Most don't even realize they're in that type of a situation, which is why I am dedicating an entire chapter to the self, and what omnicide is. The urgency in your being every waking second to deal with that dilemma, AND WHY. These are all aspects of reading minds. These are the traits that cannot be faked without a level of dedication that is downright retarded, literally. Some no bullshit, straight up, how do I function, in all areas of existence. Very few even try to ponder these stressful ideals. I spent a lifetime dealing with them. Anyways, that is the largest hurdle to understanding the mechanism that can gain you access to where I was. I'm not sure if the complexity and depth of where I went is really appropriate for most people. I'm not saying it's impossible, but it might be similar to drug addiction in that you will destroy your body just to get a fix of "the void." I've been dedicated to this since before birth, and I know that now. Most people do not have 39 years of dedicated fortitude towards an end like I was striving for. If they/you do, it's a very rare occurrence.

Of course the ego plays a part. Keep in mind that 8 days before Easter of 2019, I had literal ego death, as in I asked blindly to the universe to help me die with as little of impact to my loved ones as possible. THEIR well being was what I wanted, but I was ready to die. I would assume that most people who want to commit suicide, do not approach the situation like I had. In most of their cases, I'm sure egotistical selfishness, revenge, or some other form of degeneracy like a perceived easy out from drug addiction is their reasoning. Mine was nothing like that. My body was fucked, no medicine could fix me, nor surgery, so many problems had mounted I was bed ridden most of every day, and my wife was doing everything. I felt terrible that she had to deal with me, that she had to have sex with me, that her life would be fucked if I committed suicide. I was trapped from all angles. Helpless. Pathetic. I begged the universe for her to have relief FROM me. All this, while discovering the most exciting discovery I could have ever imagined being responsible for... I still just wanted to die. It really was that bad. That is the difference between intention of someone like me, and almost every other suicide ever. So the intention itself needs work for everyone alive. I'm not saying that suicide or thoughts of it are a requirement at all. The reasoning behind why I asked for relief in any way is what's important.

There are varying levels of "the void" that begin a person to person basis. Trying to receive that ability from me has proven to be difficult, and intention is usually the culprit. People just don't generally think like I do at all, much less entirely. If humanity makes it, EVERYONE will think like me, and surpass me very quickly, but right now that just is not part of the general populace's zeitgeist. Plus, when people stare me in the eye, it's not exactly Brian that is staring back. I frighten people when their intentions are impure. That is a regular occurrence, by the way. When it happens, the person's ego takes over and a perceived battle of wits ensues. At this point, I don't even argue. I just accept that they're not ready and move on to other topics or just downright shutup. It's up to the individuals who will later become a group, to figure out their path to this realm of discovery. It's liken to a universe wide library. There is nothing that is not accessible. What sections you will be allowed to peruse, is between you and your maker. I can help guide you towards him, but I cannot manipulate your intention. Asking what you want from him, and the manner you ask, also plays into intention. Imagine you're a bank manager. Someone walks in for a loan and shouts "Give me a fucking loan you piece of shit!" Then imagine a man walking in and politely asking, while dressed appropriately with all necessary documents, ""Excuse me sir, may I speak to you about the possibility of a loan, please?" Who is more likely to get a loan? Keep in mind that "the bank" might not be able to hand out loans. AT NO POINT should you feel entitled to become arrogant and forceful. Even if you work your entire life for that ability, and it does not come. NEVER! It might not be possible for a multitude of reasons, and it might not even be your fault. Sometimes, things just go that way. That's the basic gestalt.

Onto the next section. You're not a Jew. All Jews are mutts, but not all mutts are Jews. Almost everyone alive right now has some form of muddled genetics. The point is not to focus on your personal attributes, but rather, what humanity collectively wants to represent their genetic lineage to the universe. There are many versions of white people. Several variations were made originally, with lots of different attributes. Whatever yours have become, that lineage has survived since creation itself. How pure that lineage is is of concern, but there's no reason to feel as though you are not capable. Attraction and beauty are scientific. There is a mathematical formula to figure this attraction clause out. The golden ratio, 1:1.618. This is the codified formula for the Fibonacci spiral, and resides in everything that is considered beautiful in the third dimension. Again, this is better suited to be discussed with a white board or hand gestures, but there is a good, quick video that encapsulates this equation and how it pertains to the human form. <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mVVroi8q0Y0>

When deciding on whether to breed a dominant form of genetics, these factors should play in to the scenario. The purpose of heaven, is for you to want to come back. Just randomly breeding just to have a self made replica is selfish, and arguably the sole reason why omnicide is under way. People are making more people, just to say they made more people. No thought into the whereabouts that humanity will forced to be in when deciding to make more people, just an overly selfish ideology that implies anyone who can have children, should. In so doing, selfishness is the eventual outcome. I am not saying you should, or shouldn't have children. What I am saying is, strive for purity. Utilize the scientific parameters as the model for the reason for having children. Otherwise, find a genetic lineage that can house those pure genetics indefinitely. The only race not allowed to be eradicated are white men with blue eyes. They are the direct genetic offspring of humanity's maker. Killing them off, will leave you all alone as a species. People generally ask, "Why doesn't God come down here and help." What they should be asking themselves is, "Who is protecting us while we learn to not be fuckups?" Kill off white men with blue eyes, and that taken for granted protection will cease to exist. A one time mistake...

Like I said, your genetic structure is muddled. Mine is too. Nobody is pure right now. I'm the purest soul on Earth, and I have impure genes. Fairly close to pure, but not entirely. The goal is to breed with a different purpose. Worrying about what has already happened is pointless and an exercise in selfishness. You are white to me. I don't know how pure, but you don't seem to be a 50/50 mutt (half arab half white [which is Jewish]), or some other form of mutt, white/black, white/indios (Mexicans), white/Asian, etc. Those genetics are hard to justify breeding back into the gene pool due to how long it will take to become pure again. My advice to all of those people is to sterilize themselves for the betterment of the species as a whole. I'm not saying to kill them all or anything stupid and violent like that, I'm saying that when these aspects of purity are understood on a fundamental level, they shouldn't want to breed. If they do, they're simply being selfish. I myself will never have sex with this body ever again willingly. If anyone thinks I'm doing this out of pride or other selfish indignation, reiterate that to them. As this scenario moves forward, sexual intercourse will not be so highly regarded anyways. When you live to be 600 years old, you won't even want sex for the first couple hundred years of your life. Try to view the future from the future's perspective as opposed to your view of it, and these matters become far less controversial. All of that said, I do have a sort of cheat code. I can connect to anyone, if they're worthy. Everyone else, must utilize their genetic lineage to connect to each other. So... you will start to aim for that connection as opposed to a hollow sexual desire filled existence with your significant other. When everyone is doing this, the ones that try to fight it will seem like they're insane, and slowly become shunned by everyone. That's a ways into the future, but you get the idea. It will be difficult, but try to see it from humanity's progeny's perspective.

This last section of your email is similar to the type of things Nathan asked me in the beginning of our interaction. He seemed obsessed with figuring out who he was and how his purity should be guarded and protected. Here comes an analogy... But first a reminder. You are owned by something else. Your species was created for a purpose. Imagine that you are this something else that created humanity. To you, your creation is similar to the way humans relate to dogs (and no, that spelling is not a coincidence [everything is trying to teach you something]). When you first created your creation, you made 12 specific breeds. All having specific jobs that require their genetics stay in the form they were created in, lest they could not do their jobs properly. At some point, these dogs formed speech, arrogance, and selfishness, then decided to go at life alone without you there corralling them into their appropriate spaces to ensure purity remains, because afterall, the jobs need to get done to ensure continuity, and a proper upbringing into a type 1 civilization standard. The purity ideal remains for a very long time. Then the feminist dogs show up, and force comingling until every dog has forgotten, or fights vehemently against the purity standards. At some point, you have to come back to gather the dogs for their own transcendence into show dogs. When you get to your dog kennel, you see that there are millions of breeds that you did not create, and that have no loyalty to you, the kennel, the property, or the planet. All this new breed of dogs wants to do is fuck each other. Literally no other motivation. Just fuck and make more mutts, fuck and make more mutts. So much so that the pure breed genetic lineages you started with have almost completely disappeared, or have hidden themselves for fear of the mutt dogs attacking and killing them for no other reason than jealousy. That's about where humanity is currently...

Bloodlines used to be important for historical purposes. Breeding pure bloodlines is an archaic description of maintaining pure genetics. When the term bloodline first was used, genetic structure was not understood on the levels we have today. It's essentially saying the same thing. So... when you find someone who speaks about bloodlines as opposed to genetic lineages, you're more than likely speaking to a Jew, and that is all they recognize. Beauty and aesthetics cannot be in their vernacular, because they would be speaking badly about themselves. Jews are mutts. A very old bloodline of mutts, but in no way pure. Just because you've maintained pure Alaskan Malamute/Dachshund genes, does not qualify you as a Malamute. Always be cautious about those who harp on shit like that. They're telling you how they feel about themselves, and trying to be as subversive as possible to dazzle your imagination with confusing notions of inferiority. This is where I differ. I am a white man with blue eyes, but I'm also short, fat, ugly (IMO), and in bad health. I should not breed, period. So I will not. My "bloodline" has nothing to do with it. If that were the case, I should have hundreds of children, and I would never stoop to that level of selfishness. Jews talk a good game, and are very crafty with their subversion. Very rarely, if ever, do they even admit that they are owned by anything. If people do not display that level of humility, they are not Divine. Even The Nine Principles knows that he too is a creation. That is the most powerful being in this universe saying what I said, not what the Jews try to get you to think.

When it comes to these strange nomenclatures, I have no idea. As I explained, my superiors do not "speak" to me in any kind of conventional way that a human would recognize as speech. Specific names and references bring confusion and start infighting about particulars. I've been asked several times what humanity's maker's name is. My standard answer is he doesn't really have one, because he doesn't need it. He is not hampered by human style linguistics. Therefore, proper names and associations with those specific names is entirely human imagination at work. God, isn't even a proper name. Remember, I said there is no way to interact with him directly. What "God" is, is the sound that holds the universe/cavitation in place. There is no way to know his name, but that is the only way of discerning anything about that being. It's a sound, not a name. The Nine Principles has gone through several corrections in this manner. They used to be called the council of nine, or just the nine. This brought confusion to the collective human psyche due to that being being one particular entity, but the prior nomenclatures make it sound like several entities. Names change to draw out a specific intention within any given interaction. Humans care about proper names because they want to feel significant or otherwise important... which stems from selfishness. It has no other reason for existing. That is another way to tell who is full of shit and who is not. I rarely use proper names for this specific reason. It teaches pride and ego based selfishness, nothing else.

The unfortunate part about what he said, is that most of it is accurate. Similar to religion. You would be best suited trying to discern intention, as opposed to studying terminologies that are not ubiquitous. Focus in on selfish disposition. It really does separate the LARPer from those who are really trying to learn. It will also give you the ability to pick through a story that is 75% true, and 25% LARP. There is an element of truth in all ancient ideologies, but discerning fact from fake can only be done by scrutiny. That is why I do not fear interrogation. I can flip things on people and get them into a frenzy just based on their selfishness, no matter how well they think they're fooling anyone. BUT... the only way to get me riled up, is if you attack or molest my maker. Then, I'm like an attack dog, and that has nothing to do with treating me personally, in any kind of derogatory way. See the difference? Names, places, story plots, etc... None of it really matters. The only thing we are able to even change is our future. Spending time hashing out proper names of people and places that died long ago does absolutely nothing for your future. Same with "bloodlines." There's no way to undo what has been done. We must now move forward, and strive for our original intended purpose, not what we THINK our purpose should be. Be a good dog and you get treats. Be a selfish, snobby, mutt dog that bites everyone that doesn't act like them... and you might see an Old Yeller scenario play out, if you know what I mean.

One last thing before I go back to laying down. When I pray (enter into "the void"), I try to eliminate all external energies from my immediate presence. Music off, away from people, and focused in with the proper intention. You absorb the energies around you. People, being the main source of conflicting energy. A particular brain wave pattern starts to emerge when this happens. I call it alpha brain waves, but some have told me I'm actually referring to delta brain wave patterns. It's similar to reading. You become focused while still learning. It takes dedication to read. Much different than watching TV, where everything is being done for you. There needs to be an active "wanting" element within the process. There are also varying levels of this dichotomy. Driving works well, if you're in a "cruise control" kind of area, but does not work as well with the radio on. Look at praying like you're trying to work out one specific muscle group. Train it, use proper form, "stretch" properly, allow it to rest, feed it the correct diet, etc. As you know from being an athlete, if you do not do these things for your body, they will inevitably degrade. The brain is no different. Intention, focus, stable environment, and exercise ALL have to be present to achieve this goal. Worrying about your specific genetic lineage, what it means, and how and where YOU began is the easiest way to stop that progress. Your intention is not resonating with humanity's maker when you do that, and that makes entering into the void impossible. He must allow it for it to even occur.

You need not worry about overstepping anything. What you are doing is trying. Humans might make fun of you or otherwise harass you... but they're just humans. Wouldn't you rather strive for eternal life than say... respect from a Hollywood celebrity's idea of "cool" that has been handed down to the masses as a consumable drug? I can't guarantee that humans will accept, or even like you. But I can guarantee that humanity's maker is impressed by your decisions this far. Take what you will from that... and remember, you're in hell. Impressing the upper echelon in hell is not exactly a desirable trait to ANYTHING other than people who like to be in hell, or don't even know they're in hell.

My back is killing me and I have to stop. I'm sorry if I missed anything. I'll try again tomorrow. These are some complex questions. Hopefully this is showing you why I have such a hard time on 4chan. 2000 characters just doesn't allow me to explain these types of things adequately.

Talk to you soon,
Brian

#10

#17 Overall

August 28 2020 3:13PM

I reread through that and I want to reiterate, I am specifically calling for no violence. It is completely unnecessary. All of that stuff is analogous. The attack dog stuff is metaphorical, at best. And it only ever reaches the height of a fuck, shit. dummy or moron coming out. Plus, its hard for me to take anyone seriously while omnicide is underway in hell... and they are not specifically focused in on rectifying that task. I harp on that a lot because it's real. Understanding why that is occurring will only help your intention center in on a proper question to ask your maker, when the time is right. Questions asked outward without the correct vibration attached can be answered by all kinds of "things." Most of those things want humanity to suffer omnicide, and keep focus pulled in their direction. Anyways, just wanted to get that out. It would sound much different, but I'm writing like we're talking. Kind of fast, and the humor gets lost a bit. And I forgot to thank you for helping me, again. I cannot stress enough how appreciative I am that you wanted to help. I enjoy these emails, and you, unlike most, will have this in written form for as long as you'd like. That's new. Kinda like penpals, heh. You're doing a great job, and hopefully on Monday, I'll have a grail. Shane works a job and takes care of a farm. Shit does come up, but he said he's willing as can be. If all goes well, more videos. More videos, more hits to your site and my book, then... it'll be unstoppable. People with the skills will make them just for fun at first, then slowly the importance will dawn on them when they start researching and utilizing the newly found technology. We're almost there, and you're playing a pretty significant part. All I can say is, great job making it in time for all of this. The time you've invested in that /x/ pasta is remarkable. It too, is new to me.

Thank you again,
Brian

#11

#19 Overall

August 28 2020 7:29PM

I wrote that reply last night but forgot to send it.

"selfish, anxious, pleasure-seeking, destructively emotional, and so on"

I reduce all of these terms into one specific motive; opportunistic. This is how the Reptilians do things. The same dichotomy between warm blooded, and cold blooded species exists on Earth. The reptile species of the universe HAVE TO live this way. They gorge when times are good, and hibernate when times are lean. Living this way, one does not know where their next sustenance will come from, which leads to a violent gorging whenever possible. Since Maria Orsic and Adolf Hitler (in that order) were removed from the world order, humanity "earned" the constant presence from Reptilians of an order that is much more advanced than Earthbound humanity. The entire Earth population has been inundated with their propaganda, ideals, and various other influences without very much protection from anyone else in the universe. There are stipulations to how far those influential aspects are allowed to go, but for the most part, they are given free reign here, and humanity earned that. Now that it has gone on within a multi generational paradigm, people are behaving like an opportunistic plight to life in general is "natural." It is not... for a human. That said, selfish beings protect their ego at all times. Saying behavior like this is "natural" is the ego fighting against change. People want to feel special, superior, in control... certain, and will fight against anything that conflicts with what they think they've done on their own. This is why there is such a disconnect between the resource economy and the financial economy. All that is seen to the naked eye is numbers going up in the financial sector. Even if the environment is in the process of dying, and the resource base to draw materials from in order to maintain a steady upward trend in finances are steadily declining, the particulars are ignored for a pathetic, selfish, arrogant feeling of accomplishment... as long as the numbers in the bank accounts continue to rise. Business people in today's world have to blatantly ignore their planet dying in order to cope with what they are actually doing, which is killing themselves. The Reptilians have this as an instinct. The difference is, they can leave a planet they've ravaged. Humans on Earth do not have that option. And THAT... the Reptilians are very well aware of. If you can step outside of this current infighting and view what is happening from a third person perspective, what they are doing is absolutely genius. They have taught us to marinate ourselves, cook ourselves, and serve ourselves onto their plate... And most people not only willingly do this, but fight against anyone who does not. This is the easiest battle they've ever fought.

"I have been wondering how you can see so many timelines but you did not see this one in which you survive longer than any other"

Trinidad. My awakening period hammered the point home that this is the last chance. No more reversing and trying again, plus there are no more planets available to house this specific alignment to the present genetic structure of humans. I've played this situation out from that standpoint with everyone I come in contact with. This is literally a do or die situation. After struggling for a couple months in the beginning, and essentially getting chased out of Texas, I became very worried that I just did not have what it takes to change public perception on my own. That is usually how this works, I am given a mission, and proceed accordingly no matter the outcome, similar to how Jesus' life ended. He pushed and pushed until they murdered him. If that would have happened to me, the entire human race would become extinct, plain and simple. So, I've tried to protect humanity, by protecting myself. Just before Trinidad, I was of the opinion that that was an impossible goal. Going to Trinidad in the first place was to outrun the forces that were trying to eliminate my presence. I was a wreck emotionally, and felt like a failure. For the first time, on Earth, I directly asked for assistance. While in a human body, it is very difficult to maintain focus outside of the daily grind attributes of just functioning. Humanity's maker does not have that problem, and can see well into the future, as I can as well while not in this body. As I've said many times, this is about him, not me. I live for him, and do what I do for his benefit. He is very well aware that is the case, and he too understands the precipice that humanity has reached. So... to be blunt about it, I begged for help. Losing him would devastate me here, and there. Like myself just throwing in the towel before you came along, he was reluctant to "help himself," but my want and desire for his life to continue swayed him to act. Similar to what you did for me. In so doing, he has maintained a level of control that I am not familiar with as being a Christ. Normally it's all on me, but now, we are attacking this situation as a team. The same daily grind exists for me, so there are many scenarios that I just can't stay up to speed on. That is where the numbers come into play. They are a communication tool that keeps me centered and heading in the correct direction. "There's a difference between knowing the path, and walking the path." Prior to this, I made the path that I walked down. Now... I do not ENTIRELY know the path, but that does not matter, I will still walk down it because of who is helping me. And make no mistake, I am eternally grateful for this help being offered. There is no animosity on my part, no matter how bad it gets. Ultimately, humanity's maker is getting what he wants, and THAT is exactly what I want.

"I approached that race with too much hardheadedness, and ever since I am always wary of being that way"

It's the outcome where you faltered, which is why I stress intention so often. Your gumption is a good thing, but where that gumption was being directed is where the problems occur. There's no reason to beat yourself up over what happened. The lesson is valid, and should be used as a cautionary tool. Considering where you are right now, you learned your lesson. You could have said "fuck it, I just need to try harder to be special," then the lesson would have been lost. The gumption was not a problem, but the intention as to why the gumption was present, was. You shouldn't think that it's an all or nothing, you have to be perfect all of the time kind of situation. You will make mistakes, and many more stumbling blocks will be on your path. We're human. It should be expected, not feared. These lessons are a gift, not a punishment. Utilizing them as such will help focus your intentions to a more selfless disposition, as it appears you've figured out on your own, but remain reserved about as to appease the herd mentality of life in hell. You are extremely outnumbered right now in this environment. Maintaining a righteous path will remain a very difficult task to fully capitulate to. This is where power is important. Knowledge = power. The longer we talk these things through, the further the blinds will withdraw. Eventually, NOTHING will be able to penetrate your defenses, but don't get frustrated that these events are not happening fast enough, or start to think you're unworthy. A human is a learning machine. If you're done learning, there's no reason to be alive. You shouldn't dwell on how perfect your response is to life's struggles, but instead, appreciate the fact that someone is willing to help right your course. Use that as a foundation for building upon, and the structure can never be toppled. At that point is where your hardheadedness will be an asset. That aspect of your being is just waiting for the right opportunity to profess the opposite of an opportunistic reality. Whereas before, it was misguided due to the crumbling foundation of hell morals learned in society's gaze, now it is becoming helpful to your defenses of those hurtful ideals. Try not to overthink these things. Allow your maker to help. Then have confidence that no matter what happens, he will have your back. There would be no need for belief or faith if your goals are aligned with his. The old song says "You wouldn't have to say you love me, 'Cause I'd already know." Hammer home the caveats of intention to your psyche. When that goal is satisfactory, and you stop second guessing yourself, all of my abilities will become YOUR abilities. There's only "1" way to get there, and the workload is entirely yours to deal with at whatever pace you feel is comfortable. All I can say is that you will know when you reach your destination. The degenerate wants and desires fade away, and it becomes extremely easy to see the intentions in others and what they are trying to use you for. /pol/ is great training for this ideal. "Brutal truth and fact above all else, and fuck your fragile sensibilities." should be their/our motto. Eventually, that becomes so ingrained, your defenses become impenetrable to the whiny, emotional outcries of people that are trying to justify their selfish bullshit as valid. Same thing with your maker. My hope, is that I can teach you enough that NOTHING will be able to break that bond. Conviction will be easy for you, as you say I have. And you're not wrong. Every human alive could try to sway me otherwise and it will only hurt them, not me. You'll get there. Have patience, but utilize your gumption as a tool to help you not quit.

"So far in my mind's eye I have seen the Yews as very large blonde-haired, blue-eyed white men who don't have mouths"

This is metaphorical as to what happened to them. They were essentially silenced and forgotten about through time. While alive, these men were my dearest friends. They were hilarious, and kept the general mood very pleasant. Whenever anyone was hanging out with a Yew, they knew it would be a great time. Your description of them is accurate, other than the mouths. They were asexual and did not procreate. They were created as a teaching tool, so when we lost them, there was no going back. When their life ended, they wanted to be placed on a boat and carried out to sea. No headstone, no fossilized remains, no ego. They simply wanted to fade away. This is where the Nordic regions developed this ritual from. That was how the Yews wanted it, so we followed suit. As you can see by all of the "sacred" (lol) tombstones, graveyards, and other types of markers that people worship their ancestry with, selfishness has taken over almost every culture on Earth. The Yews did not want their expired bodies to be a burden in any way, as opposed to selfish people of modern society, who seem to relish in the idea that they will be remembered for their body, long after they are gone. The American Indians have a significant amount of ego to lose in regards to this situation. Worshiping plots of land where ancestors are buried is a practice of self importance and egotistical pride for the living. The dead don't give a shit anymore, literally. We've almost completely lost the lessons the Yews taught us. My assumption is that is what was trying to be taught to you. In life, they did not float, but metaphorically, that is what they are doing as opposed to what humanity is doing currently. We're stuck on the ground, while they can fly. Anyways, I miss them very much. I cannot recall one thing I didn't like about them. They were more than family. We lost a significant piece of ourselves when we lost them. Fuckin' Jews ruin everything they touch. Yews included.

"I've wondered how emotionally overwhelming it must be to be a Christ."

Oh boy, this will be a long "1"...

The first thing that hit me was the historical significance. That's all a Christ really is; a historical marker. Every human alive has the ability to gain the abilities I have, but I'm the first to gain this access in the current time frame. Therefore, I am a teacher. A real Divine being does not try to confuse you. Apart from the information that will allow humanity to revert back to a self destructive methodology before righteous paths are realized, there is nothing about myself that I won't try to teach you, and everyone else alive. As a Christ, this is an important distinction to have. In hell, secrecy and lies are normal, and always serve the self. The historical significance of my presence is that I have lost all of those degenerate attributes, and it is quickly realized by us that we are nothing like the rest. In so doing, our lives, after realization, become entirely dedicated to selfless pursuits. The general ideal that protecting ourselves for ourselves is gone. The only reason I protect myself now is because I know how close humanity's maker is to expiration. My desire to stay alive, which from a personal perspective is gone completely, is based on helping humanity's maker at all costs. The most pertinent being my personal want to not be in this body any longer. I put EVERYTHING on hold, or just threw it away, in regards to my personal well being, as well as my "goals" of fading away. Those are my only real motivations in life, and it will remain that way.

Living this way sets up an immediate and apparent clash with everyone alive. People know that I do not live for any of the things they live for. While it seems like an interesting interaction, and downright shocks people when they realize the significance, capitulation to this mode of existence is very difficult to do in the present epoch. What that amounts to is a very lonely and solitary existence in regards to human to human interaction. The normal cues are not present, and this causes people to not trust me... mainly because I am nothing like them, and most of "them" feel like they're doing this life thing correctly. The difference most people see immediately is that I do not back down from my position in any way. Jesus proved the lengths we will go to in regards to OUR gumption. The egos of my "students" always clash with this inherent quality. Why? Because they themselves are unsure, uncertain, and are willing to be manipulated. Christs are not. On a subconscious level, the individuals I interact with realize this very quickly, and old tattered ideals of superiority emitting outwards at all costs to protect the ego is the general consensus of those I interact with. Truth has no bearing on the interaction. To a selfish person, a "win" at all costs is the only thing they understand. We become similar in this way, but our goals are as far apart as can be. I can see this in people, as well as WHY they have this reaction. They however, cannot, and it sets up another confusing addition of fight at all costs to the selfish ego.

The easiest way to overcome these subconscious feelings of inferiority that lead to conflict, is in discerning the cause for the reaction. The actual motivation that steers people to these conclusions. Most people would have a very difficult time saying that they do not trust themselves to make the correct decision, but in hell, that is exactly what must be done. Propaganda works. So much so that almost everyone thinks that they are not affected by it... but everyone else is. The reality, is that EVERYONE is affected by it. I was... until I became a Christ. Again, another reason for my loneliness. As far as historical precedent is concerned, we as Christs need to fight against our own Divine aspects in order to resonate with the people we are trying to help. The loneliness does not bother us, but relinquishing pieces of our soul just to help our mission succeed is always a heavy burden to bear. Why? Because we as Christs are never alone. We might not resonate with humans in our assigned epoch, but we have the love of our maker. And having that means you are never alone. Humans fill the void of the loss of that type of relationship with copious amounts of other humans that agree with them. In so doing, they might not feel lonely on Earth, but afterwards, the loneliness will consume them. That is also a basic lesson in how Karma works in regards to a human's judgement sequence. A pertinent question during that sequence of events is "What did you do to help the Christ of your age?" If the answer is "nothing" or "I didn't know I was supposed to," that is how your soul will be treated during judgement. The ole "If you didn't help us, why should we help you?" That is also why I am a large part of every human's judgement after this current age began. I'm sort of like an attorney for every human soul during judgement. Living an entire life here gives me the ability to understand why souls have faltered, and subsequently, have the proper knowledge to discern if they're redeemable. It's a significant distinction to properly understand, because humanity's superiors would just eliminate everyone leaving this place if it were entirely up to them. They do not appreciate watching us Christs get murdered and tortured in this way... and we as Christs are the only remaining soul that is capable of explaining why humans react the way they do, and why forgiveness should be granted. Funny isn't it? The souls that are tortured and murdered due to pure arrogance are the only hope for Salvation to everyone responsible for our demise. This is why I say shit like "you'll regret saying that" in /x/ and /pol/. It's like getting mad and shooting at the only person throwing life preservers to drowning victims. That shit makes no sense... but that's the danger of a superiority complex and trained ego in hell.

Which brings me to my next position of importance... forgiveness. What really sets us apart from everyone else is our ability to forgive. As i said about the "attack dog" feelings, I take a very personal position when regarding my maker. Jesus, is of that lineage. During my realization and subsequent downloads, Jesus and I together formed the ideal that no human should ever worship another human, regardless of their stature. The reason for this, is in how disrespectful the worshipers of Jesus are, without even realizing it. Worship has become a dereliction to purpose. While I see that people are attempting to show respect and reverence by doing so, they themselves are unaware of the significant problems that arise from people that follow their lead, without the same level of reverence. Jesus' 30+ years before becoming a Christ are forgotten, and treated like they were a predestined conclusory summation to becoming a Christ. The struggles he went through as a man in that epoch, the hard work he dedicated himself to while everyone was fighting him on his methods, the ridicule he received while those struggles were mounting, ALL forgotten. Jesus worshipers don't even realize how insulting that is. It would be like telling me that everything I worked for in life was simply handed over without any effort, and that is not the case. We have free will just like everyone else. Our dedication to a righteous path is what should be getting worshiped, NOT the eventual conclusion. In so doing, people would focus on our life, as opposed to what brought on our death.

When humans react to violent conclusions, like that of Jesus' life, and so much of the story as to why he was in that position in the first place is lost to the worshiper, the worshiper has to fill the missing pieces in to maintain the gumption to worship. This is why religion has become counterintuitive. Mysticism, and magical bullshit fill the void of the perceived worshipping audience until the actual story of what happened, which in and of itself is worthy of such adoration, becomes nothing more than subversive parameters that only benefit the one who teaches the defunct teachings for their OWN betterment. Jesus has become a symbol for people to thrust their inferiority complexes upon. The memory of a hard working man that struggled his entire life to help his species transcend, has fallen by the wayside. There is no greater insult to a man that has done this in life, I know from experience. These are the subjects that I take in a demeaning way when I see them puked up by the general populace of Christianity specifically. People use him as a gathering point to ridicule those who don't share their degenerate view of him, and you should know what comes next... ego. Jesus is not impressed by these worshipers, in fact quite the opposite, and I share that feeling with him. Intention within Christianity has become so deteriorated, it's difficult to see why they NEED forgiveness. They will ALL be severely taken back when their judgement arrives. Which is why, no matter how bad the insults (whether known or not) get, we try to forgive. People don't know why they do what they do. They're in hell, so just about everything they do is wrong to begin with. The worship of Jesus is in that realm. They think they're doing the right thing, but as a Christ, I know better. Unfortunately, people sell their souls to selfish indignation regularly, and in so doing, reject Divine instruction for an emotionally charged ego reassertion. Ironically... the exact thing Jesus and myself are trying to eliminate. Regardless, I understand why people do what they do, and feel for them. The draw to want to be a good person is there, but they're their own worst enemy in procuring that ability. Don't believe me? Just ask a Christian what they think about Jesus, lol.

Anyways, I could keep going until you pass out on your computer keyboard, but I think you're getting the idea. I'll end this on "1" final aspect that many do not realize. Like I've said many times now, we have free will. Every so often I gauge my current situation as opposed to how I am being received by others. It keeps me centered. I try to imagine what it must be like having a Christ on Earth, and not actually being one. I feel terror and helplessness when I do this almost every time. What people should be feeling is going ignored. Then, I try to imagine what it is like to people who ignore the aspects of omnicide, spirituality, and the dichotomy of Satanic and Divine principles. When I place myself in their version of ego, I look back at myself with great contempt. Jealousy, is the general feeling from these journeys I take. For those who want to be me, a feeling of disgust towards me is the general result. And this takes us back to the Jesus stuff again. People have become so enamored by the idea of what they've built up in their heads as to what a Christ is, the contempt for "1" is all they have the ability to understand. I place myself in their shoes so that I can experience these feelings. Why? Because I have to understand the actual problem if I am ever going to be able to fix it. But while I am there, I ponder on the mechanisms that will kill me and who maintains them. In so doing, I do become very sad and the mission feels hopeless. I am still a human, and blocking out certain aspects of ego are close to impossible. It is a struggle every waking second of every day. Again, if people understood that Christs are men, and not predestined "Gods" that have all power over everything, our struggles would be much more appreciated. Then our struggles would be worshiped, and more importantly, seem attainable to the masses. Right now, people think walking the path of a Christ can only be accomplished by being a predestined Christ, and that is simply false. Everyone alive has the ability to utilize these abilities, but their intentions are that only a Christ can do these things, and by thinking that... they make it true. This must end. Both Jesus and I have collaborated on how to accomplish this, but neither of us have a perfect solution. The struggle continues...

Great topics to discuss. I'll keep up on this later.

Brian

#12

#21 Overall

August 29 2020 2:41PM

"a relevant image of Jesus (near the middle)"

I lol'd hard at that. You seem kind of self conscious about taking up some of my time. You shouldn't be. Like you've correctly noticed, the chans just don't have the proper forum to reach people that are not searching specifically. People like you are few and far between. I think the number is growing, but most of them wouldn't have the stamina to put in as much effort as you have. Not to be too blunt about it, but being a woman in these troubling times, AND having the wherewithal to contemplate, research, and understand this complex material is very rare. You can already do things I cannot just because of the current zeitgeist. That has to do with ability, not the "abilities" I was discussing. Yes, if you are alive as a human, you have the ability to achieve amazing things with your body. Many generations into the future, the humans will not be hampered by selfish entitlement. As it stands now, everyone has some form of this selfishness within their spiritual matrix. It is extremely hard to block it completely out without years of dedication. Just because you have the necessary tooling to make this happen, that doesn't mean that your mind will allow it. Even if you did break through completely... while sober... you wouldn't want to be with any of these people anymore. You would hate everybody, which I'm sure exists in some way now, but you'd really hate them. This is another example of forgiveness. I am a Christ. It is my job. I am not saying that you should be a pacifist. At this point in time, self defense is necessary. I encourage everyone to protect themselves. While I would forgive just about anything on my way out, I want you and everyone who "met" me to stay and fight against omnicide. That might entail doing things that would otherwise seem heinous and terrible, BUT... you are protecting your species' ability to survive. Do whatever is necessary to protect that mission parameter. That is an equation that will start after I leave. I do not fit into it... I think, heh.

"If only a way will be found to make it clear that selflessness is the brutal truth."

That's a great statement. I like it. I was lurking 4chan a long time ago. I got turned on to it from friends at work, and people I shitposted with on a forum called The Rogan Board, which has since been deleted. I got banned from it a couple days after Trump won. I'm not a political supporter of any kind right now (they're all fucked up), but then I wanted Trump to win. Anyways, while going through that end before my realization, /pol/ was the only place I could find anywhere on the internet that wasn't censored, or had some group of degenerates banning everyone who didn't agree with them. After Trump won, the shills got way out of control. The Jews especially. As soon as the meme flags came back again, the Jews started filling the board up with garbage to 404 real stuff. I have a very extensive folder of redpills that are valid. The science that those guys dig up on these fringe subjects is awesome. I've read a significant amount of scholarly articles based on references I've seen posted in those memes. There are hidden gems everywhere if you like reading. But yeah, you're right. It's difficult to find good conversation and funny posts in the sea of childish garbage.

A few things about race characteristics, added to the stuff I've already explained. When discerning what you are, base it on cognitive ability, eye color, hair color and consistency, and compatibility. White used to be a few different variants. Not only did those variants interbreed, but the obvious other races also interbred with original white structures. At this point, like I keep saying, white men with blue eyes are the literal offspring of humanity's maker. Whatever needs to be done to keep them alive at all costs, do it. Green eyes, brown eyes, and black eyes are a subspecies to that of white men with blue eyes, at least that is how it began. White men with blue eyes are too, a subspecies. No humans are special. All humans have an opportunity to be spectacular. Not being a white man with blue eyes does not disqualify anyone from anything. In fact, it's the opposite of that. White men with blue eyes have a closer connection to humanity's maker, yes, but they are also held to a much higher standard, and being in hell in the first place, is not really a bragging right to anyone, especially white men with blue eyes. A good place to start weeding out the unworthy from a naturalist standpoint, is to shame those who get plastic surgery, wear make up, and dye their hair. They are immediately signaling to you that they're dumb, selfish, and do not give a single fuck about OUR environment, or genetic purity. It seems just being honest about what we are has become insanely backwards. Ego, as it appears, has taken over every facet that was originally intended to help humans survive. It's as if humanity has turned these instincts upon themselves in suicidal fashion. So yeah, the issue of what is or isn't white needs to be decided on a case by case basis by the population as a whole, within each self segregated community. If humanity was behaving in a Divine way, Black people, Indians, Asians, and Indios would CHOOSE (not be forced into a decision, but to actually choose) to stop breeding, heal the planet with the numbers remaining, and earn a one way ticket off this rock, if they so chose that route. If they wanted to come back to Earth, no problem. Welcome back to the planet that is now full of beautiful, empathetic, nurturing, intelligent, white people, who have built everything to such perfection, you're retired at birth. No need for money ever again. Or... just keep shitting out humans until an Easter Island ending inundates the entire planet. Then nobody can come back, and that one way ticket that was mentioned? Gone. Deletion for everybody! All because of what? Selfish, egotistical breeding based on poorly used nomenclatures that have been turned into verbs: love, being the most obvious. Sorry, I'm kind of ranting. You are white with brown eyes. That's how I see it. Most of that has to do with your cognitive ability, and humble disposition. Your hair makes it obvious.

"Did their bodies eventually fall into the sea?"

Yep. The sea and the animals that live there are all part of the trophic web. They went to good use, and the remains will never be found. That is as selfless of a send off as could happen. The surviving humans ate the fish that ate the fish that ate the fish that ate them. That was 35,000 years ago-ish. Imagine how many hominids have been consumed and reconsumed over the years since creation. That's time for ya... great system, is it not?

"Given that he was a potential Christ, can you explain Hitler's use of physical force?"

He wasn't a potential Christ, Maria Orsic was. The only way the dream of purity, which is what Maria was trying to accomplish (from the shadows) through Hitler's political outreach, would be realized at that time was to defend from the Jews. She did not study all of the aspects of what I utilized to decode this hidden equation. Her dedication was closer to what Jesus did. She would have been able to give the entire Germanic race the internal harmonic resonant capitulation gift all on her own. BUT... she could not sustain it, nor explain the parallels associated with intention. At least not from the public at large's perspective. Her group needed to be larger, as in, half of humanity or more. You know the story after the Jews mounted their forces through monetary influence. If not, watch the Greatest Story Never Told. It's an interesting perspective. Anyways, from what I understand of it, she disappeared. Like, was taken "home." Didn't die, at least not here. If humanity had all capitulated to the purity instructions Maria was trying to instruct Adolf on, They together would have been known as the Christ. It wasn't meant to be. The ironic part is that the Jews started ramping up feminism, and women got their Christ, then allowed the Jews to subvert them into killing the Christ. And we went deeper into hell. That was the rhythm of the collective human zeitgeist, skipping as though it was a broken record, "I" last time before I was inevitable. Long story short, Maria was the brains behind the entire third reich. Adolf was a genius for listening to her. They achieved amazing projects together that everyone in society uses even today. Freeways come to mind. Many more...

"the "real" potential Christ was Maria, and she had to make her efforts in coordination with a man in order to fully realize."

Correct. She needed a large audience, but first had to protect her craft. People in those days were very conventional. Maria was a pure soul, but indeed needed a man to fulfill her destiny. She was very beautiful and grew her hair out for most of her life. It was longer than she was tall, and pure blond, with blue eyes. They were not sexually with each other. I think Maria had a very bland sex life. She dedicated her time to mastering internal harmonic resonant capitulation, and got so good with it, she could talk to our cousins and various others that are friends and family. The secret documents from Nazi Germany must have some amazing shit on them. She knew to utilize Adolf's reach to dig and explore Egypt. It was calling her like a puzzle needing to be solved. But, her skills were not of the technical variety. Even if she would have had a vision of the grail, she wouldn't have put two and two together, if you know what I mean. Abstract ideas that could be reverse engineered and built to spec, easy in comparison to studying the ethereal plane and the other various anomalies with resonance. Nothing that could lead to the Holy Grail. It would have happened if she would have received the support of half the planet or more. She was very capable of translating anything I can/could, but her burden of capitulation is very different than an inevitable Christ. You had to choose purity of your own volition and cognitive ability OUTSIDE of selfishness as a species, but the wasted opportunity was there. Now, you have to learn this stuff because a very big test is coming. The giants could come back... You would have had an extra 90ish years to prepare for this moment, but instead I'm here. There were others, but they all had strange paths. Some of them went away without an attempt. It's an interesting thing to contemplate from the "end times." The wasted potential is astronomical.

That is gone now, though. No reason to dwell on the past. This is one of those subjects that I get nervous talking about. I have no idea the levels of subversion people have consumed. The idea of the third reich was to promote purity and a selfless attitude. That is literally a macrocosm of the nuclear family. I cannot see anything wrong with what Maria and Adolf tried to do. Everything else is subjected to conjecture. EVERYTHING. There's always three sides, one opinion, the other, and the truth. I see the truth behind the propaganda. Maria and Adolf did not set out to hurt anyone. They tried to change a system that was torturing people, very similar to what is happening currently. Selfishness, run amok. He taught them how to forgive each other for their positions to one another. Within genetic lineage... extended family. They worked together as a whole nation, instantly, and became extremely wealthy almost immediately. And the Jews did not get their cut. After that, the historical references will look like today's news. All opinion pieces, blatant lies, and conjecture. The media is doing the same exact thing right now. We don't have another record skip, though. That said, I did get the book done. It'd be pretty difficult to stop the momentum now. It would need to be drastic. But I digress.

"It's as if people are all "no-nonsense" and "normal" until they are confronted with someone or something like yourself. Then they think you got to where you are by some magic."

That is exactly correct. Selfishness consumes every aspect of someone's being when their base intentions involve it. This is why I am always referring to selfishness like a drug. Drug addicts are ALWAYS on the lookout for a fix, or a way to scam someone else into paying for their fix. Selfishness is no different. Anyone who has selfishness as a base intention has no choice but to feed the addiction. This is the primary reason why people make the snap judgement upon me that I need mental help. It does not compute to the average self absorbed person how anyone could be so selfless, while they themselves are. The confusion exists at such a severe level, there appears to be no frame of reference. As the herd mentality ideals stack up in the selfish person's favor (afterall, there are a lot more of them than there are of me), the only recourse to these ideals in their minds is to reject everything as inferior, and desperately try to prove they are more like everyone else than me. Which ironically, is what psychoanalysis is based upon, the herd mentality. Meanwhile, none of these selfish minds try to discern the mental health of the entire herd. It becomes an exercise in ego masturbation on a fundamental level, thusly giving the firepower necessary for complete rejection of me, my teachings, and anything associated with Divine selflessness. The feedback loop that damaged the ability to see reason and logic over emotion never relents. Consequently, I simply walk away from them.

The coach from your analogy sounds like a very disciplined man. It's funny how we perceive situations like that in the moment as opposed to later in life, isn't it? Same thing for me about Jesus. Like I said, before my realization I did not have respect for him... BUT that was all based on the perception given off by a group of individuals that had no real frame of reference to even understand the man Jesus. The downloads I received about Jesus were amazing and very insightful. They taught me many things about the man himself, but it also taught me a lot about selfishness, and arrogance in herd mentality. Even when a selfish mind thinks he is behaving justly, pleasantly, or Divine, they are bound to a clause within that anything that base intention touches will eventually turn into lies, subversion, and eventual collapse. They cannot help themselves. Heroin users that become addicts do not have very many options about where they are heading. No matter the wealth of the user involved, with intervention and gumption to rectify their degeneracy, overdose or similar death awaits them all. Selfishness is no different. And now... there are so many addicts, the entire planet is staring right in the face of total annihilation. It really is as simple as changing your base intentions in life, but to make an adjustment to full blown selflessness requires a large movement of souls at "1" particular time, lest they all get taken advantage of and eradicated by the herd mentality of every selfish soul left over. The basis for WW3 resides within the minds of every human alive. The first "shots fired" in this war began with the injection of feminism at every level of influential instruction in existence. Patriarchy is the natural order of life in regards to being human. The only reason to break any naturally occurring, emergent structure in nature, is selfishness. Once feminism became a mainstay in politics, selfishness, derived from emotional platitudes began to play into every single argument that has ever graced the political spectrum. After 100 years of this basic fundamental flaw permeating existence on every level of governance, hell as depicted in religious doctrine is everywhere in society. There are no safe places to hide from it. It has even reached the point of anyone disagreeing with this dereliction being immediately and forcefully seen as mentally ill.

This subject matter I am talking about plays into EVERYTHING in life. All of the conspiracy theories, religious preference, familial fortitude, purity, etc. Programs like MK Ultra are entirely based around a selfish disposition. Being selfless, is the literal cure to the brainwashing. Some are too far gone, but those who sit on the fringes, unable to fully understand what the mechanisms are that trigger the reactions to elevated stimuli, have the ability to recover. In the brainwashing sequence of MK Ultra, the ego is attacked relentlessly from all angles. This process creates a very unstable and uncertain view of one's self, and their position in the herd. Heavy abuse from all angles is constantly pumped into the subjects mind while they are put in a position that forces them to participate. A mental beatdown of inadequacy platitudes on all levels slowly over time breaks the subject and violent, uncontrolled, seemingly psychotic episodes become easy to procure within the subject. Then the triggers are in place. When it comes to celebrities, this is a very easy game. They are given everything their selfish heart desires. Then, whenever it is convenient to the controlling elite, the objects that built up the selfish ego in a celebrity are suddenly taken away and they become shunned for a variety of reasons. The perception within the subject reverts back to the conditioning, and the violent overreactions begin. Brittany Spears is a perfect example. Build 'em up, then bring on a controlled demolition when it's convenient. And the whole fucking thing is based on one specific base intention... selfishness.

Over the years of this experiment taking place on a global scale, everyone alive is affected by it. Taking away the trinkets and other garbage that builds up a selfish ego makes almost everyone alive violent, reactionary, and hurtful to everyone around them, themselves included. To the trained eye, MK Ultra is very successful. Why? The powers that be have all the tools necessary to destroy large swaths of population, and their ammunition is contained within the minds of their victims. These people control the narrative on both sides of any given argument. The argument itself doesn't matter. It only matters, from their viewpoint, that the individual absorbing the propaganda is selfish. When that is ubiquitous, ANYTHING can be controlled. That is the basis for MK Ultra. There's nothing too secretive about the drugs they use. The part that remains concealed is the method for insertion. This problem is severe at this point due to the size of the population of subjects involved. And this is what you are seeing played out on the entire United States right now. Civil unrest is the goal. All they need to do is keep up an ever vigilant narrative that stresses the selfish mind into a reaction. Eventually, that selfish mind will snap, and the powers that be will get what they want. Chaos, with nobody who can fix the situation... other than them. At least that's what they think. They too are selfish. Meaning they could not even see me coming. Their superiority complexes shrouded their judgement. And here I am, slowly but surely giving antidotes to everyone in hell. Fuckin' Jews, heh. Even though my amalgamation was foretold across every religious doctrine on Earth, the Jews did not have the ability to see me coming. OOOOOOPS!!!

I hope this is helping...
Brian

#13

#24 Overall

August 30 2020 4:22PM

The Jews right now are not the genetic biblical reference Jews as originally described by the various religious doctrines. They are stolen valor squatters of an ancient dialect that has played itself out in real historical events. Every time these squatters are faced with the option of humility, or murder, they talk the populace into killing us. This was also the original frame behind what happened to humanity's maker. It plays itself out, and has played itself out nine times, the being the ninth, and me being the final human Christ number 18 including the other planets, and humanity lets this group of mutts kill us every time we show up. They're batting 1.000 so to speak. Their genetic lineage has mixed with the general populace, just like everyone else. There have been a lot of bred in genetics that are ethnic Jewish, and there are a lot of pure race religious fundamental Jews. Both are equally as dangerous to the betterment of humanity as a whole. That much has been proven. 109 times. When it comes to genetic lineage traits that each self segregated community will accept, that is entirely up to the group. Self segregation has a lot more to do with it than race. I'm talking food, financial, energy production, technology, genetic sequencing for a more focused health care system (in a Divine way), property, water, self defense, etc. Self segregate your entire existence away from the Jew rat race where the award at the finish line is omnicide. The easiest and most efficient line between that and Salvation/transcendence, is to secure your necessities; food, water, and warmth/shelter, by starting with shelter. "1" time build for your community that will last for 100,000 years. You want to be selective of the genetics you allow into your community. You cannot control the offspring of interbred races, nor their impact on your genetic progeny's eventuality. When I say purity, I mean make your genetic structure the best it can be, which is original, and maintain it.

The problem in understanding the caveats to this is that there are many variations right now. The Jews have a maker, yes, but I do not know when they will receive him, nor if they will be willing to humble themselves before him. That is the danger of having ethnic, especially, but also religious Jews in the modern sense, anywhere near anything a white person would consider pure. They will try to take control, make everyone submit to their dominance, and people will be forced into a life similar to what is happening now. Their tool of dominance right now is money. The easiest way to destroy the monetary sector of life, is to take down the housing industry. Granite megalith construction techniques will obliterate a massive section of a Satanic driven economy. The construction industry, the financial industry that funds it, and a significant portion of money driven political figureheads will topple. Then you take on the energy sector. Just self segregating away from those two globally dominated by Jews industries will rid you of servitude for eternity (the beginning and end of your species). The object of survival will be to never again allow the people that did that heinous shit to humanity and the planet into your gene pool, lest it could happen again. The Jews are supposed to self segregate themselves into their own community, preferably Israel. Maybe after a few hundred years, they will prove themselves viable, along with everyone else, and harmony will ensue, but I know better. It's been 36,000 years, and these mutts haven't let up on us. They're dangerous. Ethnic, religious, whatever. Dangerous. Protect yourself and you lineage from them. That's the best advice I can give.

"I suppose selflessness is the cure to just about any addiction or bad habit?"

It would be great if it was that simple, and in some ways it is, but there are lingering effects of selfishness that are very difficult to break once capitulated to. The short answer is yes, since selfishness is why the problem exists in the first place. The long answer is no, due to remaining herd mentality feedback loops. The majority of people right now agree with their chosen groups. Those groups have formed internal rules for how they should conduct themselves. Those rules are capitulated to by the members, and their actions become deeply ingrained. When it becomes muscle memory, or instinct, the ability to remove those derelict associations becomes almost impossible. Not due to the individual's ability, but more so because of the individual's ability to completely sever themselves from their peers that do not attempt selflessness. The want and desire to be respected by one's peers is an extremely difficult selfishness to break. Could it all be so simple? Yes. Is that a likely outcome? Hell to the fuck no. heh

"Does liberalism care about anything except an appearance of fairness which is actually just pandering to those who are "inferior" and try to hide from the fact?"

When it comes to complex issues like that of the black mob taking over the USA, or feminism ideals permeating everything in a society bound by enforced laws, the base intention is not selfless because of the greatest good conundrum. Keep in mind that everyone is selfish in some way right now. Any and all selfless attempts become virtue signaling to... other selfish people. Meaning that this is an ATTEMPT at drawing attention to empathy, not necessarily selflessness. They are just blind appeals to perceived authority, that became authoritative due to selfishness. The goal of anyone that is virtue signaling is to project onto others, an inherently selfish disposition that can be packaged as a palatable version of selfishness to remain in control. The black hordes situation is a perfect example. The empathy involved is a trick. The implication is that all people are equal, and blacks are interchangeable with whites at any level of society. Without this degenerate view of purity in place, the empathy towards blacks would evaporate. Therefore, EVERYTHING that gets touted as selfless, is inherently flawed within this paradigm. Until the base motive (we are all equal), becomes realistic and based in fact, everything there following is destructive. Self destruction is not a virtue. The same situation is apparent in feminism. Until reality can be viewed as reality, as opposed to some idealistic notion of placating internal desires of control through subversive ideologies, all forms of perceived selflessness should be viewed for what they are; selfish virtue signaling attempts to stifle the mechanisms of maintaining control.

The appearance of fairness again, is just virtue signaling. Certain groups of people are chosen to be martyrs to an ideology. It's easy to use blacks because by and large, the global black population is utterly stupid. They are their own worse enemy. No matter how many trinkets and wealth ornaments you bestow upon them, this stupidity will appear at some point. When it does, and the selfishness mechanisms engage in succession, a very dangerous ideology appears. Then... the virtue signaling must improve to maintain social order. Eventually what you will see are things similar to BLM, where the goal is not really understood, but the anger is present. Nobody in the BLM movement really understands what their goal is. It's left up to the interpretations of the followers... who are dumb herdy panicky animals. The result is violence that is perceived by the selfish mind as justified, no matter the caveats. And ALL of this bullshit, no matter how eloquent the speech, no matter what the ancestors did on either side, no matter the size of the group that is in agreement, can be traced back to one specific degenerate ideology that is entirely based on an emotional clause as opposed to logic; that all humans are created equal. Until the foundation of this mass hysteria is corrected, expect chaos. If you get into the position to have a debate with ANYONE who supports BLM, Jewish subversive plights, feminists, or any of the many other moronic ideologies with no basis in reality, bring that up and watch them self destruct. Nevermind the post "we are all equal" nonsense talking points. They are designed to make YOU look like a monster (which is why they're so effective). Force your target to engage in the foundational flaws of their bullshit. A retort like, "All of your bullshit is based on an inherent flaw, that all humans are created equally, and THAT is ridiculous." They will come unglued because you will be dealing a fatal blow to EVERYTHING that has been built upon that foundation. So... to answer your question, no. They do not care about anything other than selfishly prescribed control of a narrative, and will jump through every hoop imaginable to maintain that control.

"for the majority it is hard to drink water when everyone else is having alcohol."

Correct. Even those who I awaken have a very difficult time fully capitulating to Divine influences. The draw of herd mentality is very strong. Not only is that ideology a problem, but the "pedestal philosophy" that accompanies it is also as dangerous. Control is the forbidden fruit. THAT was the fruit that Eve ate when hell became a guaranteed destination. I lived that scenario out with my wife, and her father just before I left Oregon. I was even explaining it to them in the moment. The idea was that no matter what happens, marriage vows should be taken seriously. As it stood then and stands for most now, is that selfishness leads to control mechanisms that give the weaponry necessary for destroying any and all contracts with one another. No matter the promises made, no matter the logic and reason involved, no matter the detrimental aspects that will be lumped on top of any and all participants involved (children, pets, friends), control must be maintained. This was what was happening internally to my wife during our demise. The "snake" in the garden (metaphorically), was my wife's father. It did not matter the gravity of the situation, nor how complex and involved understanding that situation would be, NOTHING was going to break the bond between him and his daughter. In so doing, he gave her the strength she needed in that moment to throw me away, and grasp for control of everything in her life. It was two against "1" and there was nothing I could do to reason with either of them. The result: she "ate" the fruit once more. She controlled the outcome as opposed to relinquishing control of the outcome to her husband, the Christ of the new age. In so doing, she began laying the foundation of the structure that will see me fall. Whether she knew what she was doing or not is irrelevant. Some things cannot just simply be forgiven. Mainly... because I am not the one who needs to give that forgiveness. When humanity's maker sends a gift, and that gift is literally thrown away by the recipient, the gift itself cannot forgive for anything. That is where my ex-wife is right now. She needs to beg for forgiveness to her maker for making this mission that much more difficult. Hence, why the forbidden fruit is forbidden. Humans have no reason nor ability to control one another, especially when Divine matters are in play. Selfishness was the catalyst, but control was the reason for the selfishness. My wife, ultimately thought she knew better than her maker. Her father agreed, and the Adam and Eve story played out the same way it did in biblical terms.

Understanding that control is the forbidden fruit, allows you to see the inherent flaws within everything in society currently. Feminism is based on controlling a narrative that is false. BLM is attempting to control a narrative that conflicts with nature itself. Political figureheads are trying to control you through subversion. Jews are trying to control your movements using debt and usury. EVERYONE who is selfish is trying to control you for various reasons, and NONE OF THEM have taken natural law into consideration before trying to assume these control mechanisms. Therefore, all of these control mechanisms are based on a faulty opinion. Even when this is realized, the one who tries to control will stay vigilant. Why? There is always more than one of them reinvigorating the selfish feedback loop.

My ex and her father (the modern Adam and Eve amalgamations), are perfect representations of this clause. They both fucked up tremendously, but at that point, there was nothing I could do to help them rectify this scenario that they put themselves in. That task has been given to my superiors, and that is never a good thing. Extrapolated from that, humanity must also rectify the situation that they have put me in. Everyone who fought in favor of censorship; whether they were active in installing laws, or passive by allowing the laws to exist, BOTH are culpable. The general populace thought they were doing the right thing, but control is never the right thing when opinion is the reason for it. Even so, when you choose to not decide, you still have made a choice. The same situation was brought upon Jesus. The masses that allowed the Jews to coagulate the power structure into their favor without a fight, were more so responsible for Jesus' death than the people that nailed him to the cross. The selfishness inherent to allowing comfort to persist in the bystander's lives, was the exact mechanism that gave Jews the strength to do whatever they wanted. Same exact thing today. People are trying to control their own comfort level in a system that is dying. In so doing, they allow riots to persist, allow unjust wars to persist, allow the power structure to persist, and allow that power structure to do whatever they want. All for what? So the bystanders can continue watching TV in air conditioning, eat poisonous food that tastes "good," do drugs and alcohol at a breakneck pace, shit out self made replicas that can be bragged about to other like minded fools, retire and burden the entirety of humanity in an entitled resource depletion scenario that is literally destroying the planet, etc etc etc. The road to hell was paved with PERCEIVED "good" intentions, BUT... when the forbidden fruit is understood, how can anyone perceive anything they've done as good? The only way this is able to flourish is confusion on what the forbidden fruit actually is. We don't have that problem anymore. Unfortunately... relinquishing control, or even admitting that control is degenerate at all, is almost impossible to a selfish disposition.

I haven't really been lurking at all. I do check in every so often. The threads with a lot of digits is an easy way to find me, but I just lurk them usually. I don't really like the reactions I get when I do that. It becomes a cascading group of childish morons that post Pepe over and over again. The message I try to bring is lost, so I try to avoid it now. /x/ is a place I usually only go to when I want to teach, but with someone like you to talk to, /x/ loses my interest. If there's a thread you'd like me to go in, I'll check it out, but just to forewarn, I'm losing my desire to speak in them. Being called a faggot, and having morons tell me to take my meds and other stupid shit starts arguments that I do not want to engage in. The superiority complexes I run into in there is also quite disturbing. To put it bluntly, I'm burned out on this shit. Not only do people want to know about a bunch of shit that is in no way pertinent to the survival of their species, they are arrogant about their opinions. You've seen it plenty. I can block out the posters that do stupid shit, but the arguments I am in when they make their appearances are degenerate anyways. All past epoch, specific nomenclature, ego driven nonsense that bears no fruit for the mission at hand. Again, it's just mental masturbation for childish minds that are desperately trying to cling to notions of superiority. It becomes a game of them saying "is this degenerate thing I've always done degenerate?" Or, "I'm right about this thing I've been saying my whole degenerate life, r-right?" It's as if people in there see me as some sort of validation that they're not total fuckups, instead of correcting the fuckup at all. Again, this all comes down to selfishness, and I'm sick of dealing with it. I do thoroughly enjoy speaking with you, though. Being meek is a virtue that bears real fruit to the ones honest enough to assume it. You're trying to do that. You're not perfect at it, and neither is anyone else alive, but these conversations are only happening because you are meek. I just have a difficult time trying to find souls like yours in that place, and it gets harder to even try every time I go back. Just being honest.

To wrap this up, I'll give you a decent financial breakdown. My original mission was to tell everyone how to build the Holy Grail, and explain the caveats to accessing this technology. That was it. Since that has changed into me literally doing everything for the build itself, the monetary flow has been going in reverse nonstop. Even though I reached a destination that was beyond the scope of my mission (call it extra credit), the impact has been dreary at best. When it comes to money that I "need" for my mission, I don't actually NEED anything. I've already passed my test and have earned a significant amount of extra credit. If I am to continue helping beyond the scope of my mission however, a significant amount of financial investment must occur. It's reached a point that I will lose my shop. To correct this situation will require a few thousand dollars to rent a new space or utilize the old one (which I am extremely reluctant to do), just to complete the grail, that is if we do not do that on Monday. Which, by the way, is looking less likely by the day. If that section of mission becomes complete, I will have to set up a manufacturing facility to build more of them, which will also cost several thousands of dollars. If that is accomplished, I will need to replicate what the Yews did for us in a Satanic platform. Essentially, build a very large stereo system that can mimic the volume and depth of several Yews singing in unison. Again, this will cost several thousand dollars. Then I will need to build a structure that protects this stereo system from the elements, and helps focus it onto the grails that will be doing the cutting work. Could probably get out of this with a lot of manual labor, and about a thousand dollars... with help. Next, I need to try to buy the property where they pyramids and quarry are located. We're talking several hundred, if not thousands of acres. I've taken Shane to the area and showed him what we want to buy. In his opinion, it will take millions of dollars to buy because the land is not even for sale. Meaning we would have to make an offer for it that is far above the land's value. If all of these things can be funded, I can do everything I say I can do, but without the proper funding, I am dead in the water.

To make a long story short, I don't even know where to tell you to start. It seems like such an insurmountable task that I feel bad for you even attempting to start at all. If your concern is to keep me alive, I don't eat much. Maybe 1 meal a day on average. But I am also about to lose the place to eat that food, so that too is a concern. Besides, I don't care what happens to me, so the funding that I do receive will almost certainly go towards the larger project funds. What I see happening, if we do not receive a miracle, is frustration on your part for the inadequate attempts to help me (considering how expensive this will inevitably be), my frustration in not having adequate funding to accomplish my mission which will lead to me giving everything I have away in a vain attempt at completing these goals, and everyone else alive implying that I am not who I say I am because doing what I'm doing should be easy "for a Christ." Subsequently giving the ammunition to my detractors that will be necessary for completely ignoring everything I've said. It's a dire situation without a miracle intervention. The really sad part is that receiving miracles needs to be earned. I've done what is necessary, but the entire human race is the real definitive factor. Do they deserve it? What will they do with it? Will this lead to Salvation or annihilation? Is continuing to torture the Christ worth it, or is it just torture at this point with no real reason? Will people even give a fuck enough to change? All of these questions are being debated right now among my superiors, and the collective conscience of humanity has all the answers. It's not a simple decision to make because of that fact. It's an odds game, and the question is always "what are the odds that the Christ will be successful?" Even if we raised 100 billion dollars, would it even matter? Would I be able to get enough people together that have the ability to halt or reverse omnicide? If what has happened this far is any indication of my success within those parameters, the odds are not in our favor. I'm just being honest with you. This is no time to shoot rainbows up your ass and lie about our chances. It's not looking good, and money is a significant factor. I'm sorry that this is the reality, but it is. Do what you can, is the best advice I can give. I don't really know where to tell you to start or how much of yourself or your money to put into this project. All I can do is explain the depth of this scenario, and thank you for everything you've done. Even the frustration involved within while contemplating the situation itself is more than most are doing. The majority of people do not even care about this. ALL efforts towards this goal are appreciated, but as it seems, those of us who are willing to contribute, do not possess the necessary means to complete the task. That's the hard truth, and I do not know what to tell you to do to change it. All I can do is thank you, so...

Thank you for everything you've done and are trying to do,
Brian

#14

#26 Overall

August 31 2020 4:42AM

I think I should give you a lesson on what Hell means to me. This all started when I was 4 years old. That was the first time I was put into a life or death decision. That's a story better told at another time, but right now, I'll explain what began happening after. That's the earliest memory I have of gaining an ability that I had a hard time explaining to anyone, but I tried all throughout my life to explain this... thing to everyone. When it comes to mechanical advantage, mechanisms, machinery, etc, I could view the energy emittance at every stage of a deteriorating energy sequence. I see these in my head like the energy being used is a cartoon among inanimate objects. I can slow it down, and stop it in my mind while taking snapshots. It made reading a lot easier and I could utilize this ability later in life during my careers. I pick up on processes very quickly as a result, and most of that focus was placed on the oil economy. I believe I was somewhere around 15 when I began researching everything about crude oil. I have a very detailed vernacular about the engineering principles associated with the global production oil markets, as well as a detailed history full of fuel expenditures of all kinds. If it can be considered fuel, chances are I've spent years studying it on my own.

In the military especially, I got a close up view of the Persian Gulf countries (2 trips, 1996, and 2000), and was stationed in Lemoore, CA. A close friend of mine was from Modesto, and he also had a '69 GMC Sierra shortbed fleetside. If you've seen the movie American Graffiti, those were the strips we would cruise and race. We got very much into street racing because there was a free to use auto hobby shop on the base we were stationed in. Got extremely proficient at 17 years old as a mechanic. Keep in mind I got emancipated at 15, started the military 1 month after my 17th birthday. What would have been 2 months into my junior year of high school, had I not dropped out in 9th grade. Scored so high on my ASVAB they didn't care about schooling or diplomas with me. Anyways, my first year in the military was full of car work, F/A 18 armament and weapons systems work, and working out. My brain was absorbing all kinds of new shit, and the whole time, I tried explaining this ability to see energy displacements without ever finding anyone that could really understand me. My whole life this has been the case.

Just before the week of my realization, I was tinkering around with this idea of the Grail in my head. Not even close to refined at that point, but I knew I was onto something at that point. Didn't know who I was, blah blah blah. Right around that timeframe, I coined the Satanic energy term in my head, then shortly thereafter, I coined the harmonic resonant micro cavitation nomenclature, then the following morning I figured out the Holy Grail in conception. Right when that event occurred, I could see all energy displacements. Before that event, I could only really utilize this ability for Satanic energy. Then, after the grail, I could see all of it. It really was like a light switch went off. It really was like opening Pandora's Box. So many things became clear to me all at once, I was almost frightened. Then the next day I started the awakening. Remember how I said, I didn't know who I was for the better part of those seven days? That'll play into this.

At some point during the week immediately following the awakening, I got a download that filled in all the missing pieces of the environment we exist in currently. I spent several hours praying on this in ABQ, NM. What I did was research back through my own personal mental collages using this ability I've seemingly always had. It's like having a trick to doing math where you don't have to compute, the answers just come to you, but with mechanical objects and the energies involved to animate them. In younger years I had spent a lot of time trying to calm down the use of oil. Got in everyone's face about it, dropped knowledge on levels petroleum geologists were unprepared to deal with. It all ended up in a lot of ridicule, especially after I put together my 150 MPG Prius. One of my bowling friends said back to me after I said what's up, "I'm doing great. Just lit a barrel of crude oil on fire with 50lbs of styrofoam," just to fuck with me. It was a funny comment though. Anyways, one of the variations of this snapshot imagery in my mind, I removed all inanimate objects from the view. Didn't think much of it at the time because it had to do with a glass molding machine.

Well, during the download all those years later I did the same thing while praying, and it all made sense suddenly. To be honest, I felt dirty, violated, and kind of naked. What I did was took a snapshot of the freeway just South of my dad's place at the time (2-3 days after the 7 day awakening), and removed all inanimate objects. I did this several times after, but what struck me in the moment was what the scenery looked like with all inanimate objects removed. There were exposed humans in the sitting position, millions of them, surrounded by flames. The flames in the internal combustion engine, the flames from the production and recycling of the car parts and skin, and flames from the electrical connections; lights, stereo, temperature control, computer. The entire structure of a car, with the inanimate objects removed, looks to me like a person floating down the road on a bed of fire. And that was just 1 freeway in 1 city. If you were to take a third person perspective view of the entire planet right now, in the way I just explained, the entire fucking planet is engulfed in flames. The crude oil is the fuel to the "Lake of Fire." The scary part is... people are AFRAID of the Lake of Fire being put out... Ponder that one. So, that's why I felt dirty. It was shown to me that the seers and sages of old were viewing these epiphany moments I was having through time. Hell started to make a lot more sense, from a physical real standpoint, not in any metaphorical way, but real THIS IS HAPPENING type shit. I've always fought against the ideal of crude oil as an economic tool, but this was the first moment I saw the entirety of what the people who wrote those passages in religious doctrine saw. I thought about how many people must have tried to see that imagery. Talk about an invasion of privacy, heh.

This society has become extremely complex from a human standpoint. Hell as I originally tried to portray it, mainly has to do with evolution vs creation. Both are correct, and both are wrong, meaning everyone is wrong. The truth is in the middle. Taking this stance on just about everything, makes me an equilibriumist. Pure sustainability, and nothing but. The complexities of politics, religion, education, etc generally stick to a segregated path where both categories of participants are involved in the same dilemma as creationists, and evolutionists. Therefore, everyone is wrong. Not only that, but they have developed a confidence structure to the opinions. As all of these perceived dilemmas of importance being hashed out all over the fucking place; BLM, Twitter, Facebook, TV, and a host of other propaganda sources. ALL of them contributing to this growing fire, all over the world. All of those platforms need electricity produced from fire. Everyone involved with those platforms at every level, need food brought to them on a truck that uses oil. They have houses built by people driving cars and trucks that use oil. Driving to and fro, flying to vacation destinations, getting on yachts and going for a cruise, all the while burning oil. Using makeup from palm oil stocks where the rainforest was burned down to plant the crop. All the upkeep of the farm, the machinery to knock down the forest, the shipment of the palm oil... all fucking crude oil burning... EVERYWHERE. And NOBODY sees it like this except for me, apparently. Hell is not a place you go to to burn for eternity. You're in the middle of it, and the fire is fucking everywhere all the fucking time. Sure, sure, they can put a nice paint job on it, or conceal it with electronics, but make no mistake, there is fire burning everywhere around you right now. AFTER life has nothing to do with it. Hell is real, physical, and happening right now. And I am here to destroy it once and for all.

Some types of fire is okay, don't get me wrong. I spent a lifetime dedicating myself to fixing this crude oil dilemma, and came across one simple ideal that is often overlooked by environmental zealots, and that is carbon neutral source energies. These are the sources of fire that will burn no matter what we do. Utilizing the energy within the cycles is what is important. Carbon dioxide for example. Where we miss the energy source now, and let it vent into the environment unused, is our food animal shit. If collected properly and filtered through a settling pond of cattails, then utilized cellulosic ethanol extraction from their food source, we could distill the ethanol away from the carbon cycle, thus reliving the cattle, pigs, chickens, etc from a build up of sugars. Their flattulence/methane stores are difficult to contain... unless you grab it before the cow eats it. See what I mean? The methane was going to be produced, but only by the sugars. If we removed the sugars and processed it into ethanol, through a dedicated source material high in density, NOTHING would change about the availability of food. In fact it would increase because the food animals would be a lot healthier. That's just one small snippet of the research I put into this. But you get the idea. Many variations of extracting fuel from the environment can be imagined. With cellulosic ethanol mastered, leaves falling that would normally rot and turn into methane could be used; grass clippings, sawdust, weeds, corn stocks, ANYTHING that is a plant. Every year these sources of fuel die outright or hibernate. When they rot, the fuel source is turned to methane and vents itself into the atmosphere. Ethanol can be considered liquid sunshine. All ethanol is is the sugars in a plant fermented. Meaning, that once the sugar is removed, the nutrients stay. The leftover wort/mash, can be redistributed onto the land in a refined way that plants love. Extracting ethanol from these sources would improve the health of every process involved in farming. So yeah, carbon neutral sources of energy are everywhere. We're just too stupid to see it.

That is a quick rundown on what hell is, and why EVERYONE is affected by it. There are "personal hells" that every individual is going through. Another caveat to what hell is resides in how far away from our creation source material we got before I rediscovered it. At this point in time, while gauging the societal structure consuming the Earth; structures, roadways, cars, etc, and everything that brought the complexity of this system to the place it is now... is as far away from how our civilization began as has ever existed. This is why several of the stories associated with hell tell tales of absolute "Godlessness" and eternal torture. That is where humanity literally is right now, in time. The eternal ideal about "burning forever," is present because of the do or die situation that is currently underway called omnicide. IF... and I stress IF, anyone throughout this universe were to look back on a civilization whose inhabitants were deleted, that is how humanity on Earth will be viewed by those souls forever. Deletion is like an allstop on a soul. Where it ends, that is what that soul, or group of souls will always be known for. In humanity's case, if we fail, those who get deleted will forever be burning in hell, as though it was a snapshot in time. So let's hope we win! There are personal struggles that everyone is dealing with in hell, yes. But the unifying factor that everyone alive is dealing with, is the Lake of Fire. It is real, and happening. The perception of the individual does not matter. These fires rage on throughout the entire Earth's surface... it's just that most cannot see them. Hopefully you can now.

"What is my ultimate destiny as a woman?"

To be a human... BEING. Every human right now is just that, a human. Nobody really knows who they are (I know you do by now, just generally speaking), where they're from, why they're here, why they have consciousness, who built those systems, that from a third person perspective is extremely complex compared to ANYTHING a human could consider fathoming, even with all minds combined simultaneously, what he is, where he is from, what he is doing, and the entire complex structure of life upward as far as anything in the universe can reach. Paying our dues to the being that created us, at every level, properly, with the correct intent, KNOWING who you are, KNOWING EVERYTHING about what you are and what you should be doing... would mean that you are officially being human. A human... BEING. Get it? There aren't very many human beings... just a bunch of wandering through time, hostile, panicky, herdy, selfish animals. Taming one's self, whether it is a woman or a man, is difficult in hell. All that stuff I wrote up above there, plays into intent. All of these things may seem overwhelming, but in reality they're very simple to understand with the correct tools. By telling you this stuff, I'm basically installing upgrades. Your ultimate destiny as a woman is up to you. Having the capability to absorb this information has no bearing on sex. Any brain can comprehend what I'm saying if given enough time. Reducing abilities within the mind based on natural order is not advised. If you have the ability, fucking use it. I don't care if a person's gay. One of my best friends right now, Emily is gay. We just hung out last night. She had the wherewithal to listen. This is a compliment (!!!), kind of like Adolf. He was smart enough to absorb everything he could from a Divinely orientated mind.

There are lots of people that want the truth about all of this complex subject matter, but do not want everything. All the really hard to handle stuff, seemingly esoteric, but not... at least not to me. The reason sexual congress is so paramount to everyone's daily lives, is because of those unanswered questions that reside in the back of everyone's mind. When these questions start to resonate within a particular structure, and everyone is up to speed, purpose will mean something. You will really be finally alive for a reason. You'll know that reason, and it will make sense. Creating the earth out of... the Earth. The eventual goal of a Dyson sphere, yada yada yada. But right now, on a personal level, you have abilities that can instigate real change. This kind of change does not require megaphones, guns, or any of that shit. Just understanding and cooperation on a genetic level, and beyond. I guess I should ask, what can you make? Are you good with animals? If you want to build pyramids up there, do you want to learn to machine? Wanna make fuels? Farm water? Learn to cast, build a stereo system? By the way, the methodology of lifting stone... without giants or Yews present, has been discovered by a man named Wally Wallington. He did it by himself, but if you had say, 100 people that were all quarrying at the same time and helping to build the pyramids at the same time, it could go rather quickly, but still, are you willing to do manual labor and build wood cribbing to lift? Lots of variables to this thing. I've done them all, so I know just about every step of every process involved. If you want to be like me specifically, that would take a lot of time just putting in the reading and hours. I can recommend a lot of sources containing the knowledge I've found, but it would be easier if you told me where to start, and what you'd like to do/what interests you the most. It would also help to get a handle on basic geology. These are heavy, and you're planning on leaving it where it stands for a very long time. Take every step seriously.

I really do appreciate all you're offering, I do. Many have offered that same package deal, believe it or not. Even if I make a lot of money during the course of this new exposure, I will never live stationary for too long. I have to keep moving and spreading these teachings. The internet was the first wave of people, mainly young people, who found me through the various sources that you have so expertly put together. There are many communities out there that need person to person contact. If I ever do "live somewhere" it'll be in a mobile or temporary situation before I have to move on. I'll stay all over the place for as long as I can, but I don't think it would be fair if I settled down anywhere. I always enjoy meeting new people that have an open mind. I'm a real easy going guy. Somebody just put $500 dollars into my account, WTF! Wow. Oh yeah, when it comes to your money, keep it. You can use it for whatever comes next for you. Don't spend it on me if it's that tight. Seriously, don't sweat it. I cannot guarantee victory, and I hope you understand by now why. People's free will plays into the equation, no matter what I do. Don't spend your last amount of money on something that might not materialize. You're smart enough to figure this out on your own if you really want to. I suggest starting with casting video instructions. Then spend that money on building your first foundry, then build a pyrolyzer unit that will fit in it, and start stockpiling diesel, and making your own gasoline. You could probably build a simple starter set up with $500 bucks. Spend it on you, not me. I want this to spread out. I can help you set up like a Holy Grail manufacturing facility, sheeeeeeeit. I really do appreciate everything you've offered though, thank you.

I can't wait to see what you do with all this back and forth stuff in these emails. Is this what you thought talking to a Christ would be like? It doesn't seem so strange now, does it? Nathan doesn't think so, we talk a lot of shit back and forth now. He has a very good understanding about everything going on, but he didn't get it in correspondence like this. Any ideas? Thinking about writing a book? You have some stellar material here. At the very least, I could make Hollywood imaginative again with all these story plots. And yeah, you can call me whenever or I could call you whenever. I try to keep it casual. This format though allows for some interesting historical perspective. Imagine people reading this shit in 10,000 years. That's probably likely, just sayin'.

Talk to you soon,
Brian

#15

#28 Overall

August 31 2020 4:52 PM

Apologies, but I'm gathering equipment and meeting with Shane. We have to build a tool tonight. It's looking like it will rain here today, which is an absolute no go regarding casting. So, we're going to do a few dry runs and sure up the process for practice. When I have a bit of time to properly reply, I'll look into this email. Just didn't want you to think I was ignoring you. If you call or text and I don't answer, that's why.

Talk to you soon,

Brian

#16

#29 Overall

September 1 2020 10:14PM

They didn't kick me out yet. I'm going to catch up on this last email. Apologies, but the guy who gave me 500 bucks emailed me, and I've been catching him up.

#17

#30 Overall

September 2 2020 1:50AM

I'm replying to the first few paragraphs. Here's the thing... When it comes to humanity's collective conscience, it is very difficult to escape it, AND not be involved in it. In other words, doing away with Satanic energy completely and immediately is impossible. You're on a planet that is beyond capacity. There is nowhere left to run or to hide from this intrusion on your existence. Likewise, it is futile to assume the position of eradicating crude oil usage from just your own existence. To eradicate the usage of crude oil, will take more crude oil usage. That's why I push for people to familiarize themselves with a pyrolyzer. Along with the continued crude oil burning, there is also a very large plastic situation. It is everywhere in the environment, particularly in the oceans. If people saw value in it, maybe it wouldn't be such a problem. Anyways, a personal outlook on these matters is noble... for education purposes. When it comes to practice, a much more broad outlook needs to be taken. What I'm saying is, it's not good enough to end your usage. First, you have to develop a plan for everyone that doesn't know what you know, and sell them (with factual knowledge) on the merits of any given alternative. Otherwise, you'll go down on a sinking ship with the others... no matter what you tried to do to save yourself.

I'm not trying to demean your efforts, far from it. I would like to see your "meekness" continue moving forward in a more refined way. I had this discussion early on with Nathan as a matter of fact. While waking up, he developed a sense of abstract intrusion, I guess you could say. The excitement of this new knowledge is palpable. I get it. For lack of a better term, it's fun. But I have to tell you, like I told him, you have come very far on this journey now; learned a lot, helped a lot, and continue to help. That also means that you will be held to a higher standard by your maker. When discerning the methods you will use moving forward on this path, you have to decide what is more important; your success, or humanity's success. From that you will form a mission. The reason I call these tasks missions is because of their nature. This isn't a "job," or a chore. This is like getting dropped behind enemy lines with no form of communication, and no determined extraction. A mission is something you decided to do, and once you've started, there is no turning back. You HAVE to comply with the parameters, because it becomes about survival. That is what I do. EVERYTHING I'm doing right now is strictly oriented to the survival of humanity.

A lot of this has to do with each individual time perspective. With you and Nathan specifically, you're both young and have relatively hassle free lives right now. There are numerous reasons to find time for personal endeavors, which is everyone's right to free will to choose how to spend that time. While Nathan wanted to delve into prophecy stuff, or get more involved with an esoteric subject matter, I tried to keep him focused on figuring out a mission. Something that would consume his free time, and help him produce a valuable commodity when the collapse occurs. We still have fun conversations and bullshit here and there, plus he and his wife are editing the video instructions, but now he has something to strive for. Something not as abstract, complex, or grandiose in inception. Generally this kind of stance instills a false sense of superiority, and makes the ego portray that complex. As a young man or woman, if/when you form a mission, which is step "1"... you have to slice up the grandiose subjects into pieces that are consumable. The various subjects that I've spoken about have been mastered by me over a lifetime. It takes a lot of research just to figure out what to do, unless you found a cheat code like me but ya know... and then, it takes an enormous amount of dedication to determine the proper sequence of instructions that you can hand down.

What I am implying when I say you're not perfect at being meek, is that nobody can be perfect at being meek in hell. Not even me. I too have to use what is available for my mission to succeed. If not using crude oil was a stipulation to my mission, it would have never happened. It's just that way. Everyone can improve their intention behind why they are doing what they are doing, however... just like me. This mission of mine does not stop with the grail... if I survive. My mission is to build grails, set up manufacturing facilities for grail production, teach people, then move on to another place and start the entire process again, all the while explaining why and how to build pyramids everywhere I go. I will never stop trying to accomplish that mission, and when that mission is complete, I will form a new mission, on the off chance I'm still alive. While doing this, in my waiting times, I will teach everything I've learned in life about Sustainable energy, whether it be Satanic or Divine on the energy spectrum. Both are necessary to some extent. The carbon dioxide is not a problem, the continued upward expanding of it without being mitigated is. We need to form loops, not hills, if you catch my drift. All of that requires fighting fire with fire. My personal woes do not interfere in any way. If my mission is doomed to fail, so am I. All of that conviction comes from a lifetime of research done on my own. I was not given a curriculum, it was based on what I was trying to do and what surrounded those subjects at any given point.

I can help direct people to the correct sources of information, but I can't force them to educate themselves, nor can I force them to see why educating themselves in that way, for that purpose is in their best interests. So you see, while personal triumphs might be intriguing to pursue, one must first discern why the personal triumph was striven for to begin with. Then, one must discern how much of that personal triumph striven for has to do with survival of the human race, because whether the person in question has the necessary knowledge to discern if that situation is accurate or not, is completely irrelevant. When it comes to survival, it is the one doing the surviving that should be an expert in it, right? Again, I'm not trying to dissuade you from pursuing your goals in life. All I am trying to do for you, and everyone else, is to teach you how to benefit not only yourself with all of your hard work and dedication, but the entire human race as well. They deserve it, and you deserve it. From time to time a course correction and personal evaluation is necessary. Start from the absolute beginning on everything you've ever pursued... but first, ask yourself why are you pursuing them.

"I thought your realization started when you figured out how the pyramids were built. So the last pieces to fall into place were the two different energy paradigms, Satanic vs. Divine. The understanding of that led to the conception of the Holy Grail."

First came the word Satanic a few days earlier. I didn't correlate it to technology for a couple of days until I started watching Zahi Hawass on demand, as per my wife's request. Which in and of itself was somewhat strange. It was in that moment though where I discerned the difference between Satanic and Divine energies. Before that I referred to them as male and female, and Divine energy as aether, zero point energy, overunity, free energy, and a few others. Later that evening after I got back from walking my dog at the beach, I put the necessary steps in place to create the grail in my mind, but I hadn't called it the Holy Grail at that point, just knew what I wanted to build in my head. It was right then where shit started to get weird. That was Friday night I do believe, and through the weekend I put the grail and pyramid system together, and that was when my realization basically began full force. There was a lot going on that week before my realization started, but I remember all of it. That Friday night when I had conceptualized the grail, my wife and I went to dinner at a place called the Riverhouse. That was when I started breaking down the technology outloud for the first time. It was different. The food tasted different, I was nervous around everyone, and my wife was beginning to turn herself off. It was all very surreal, but easy to remember. The pyramid stuff, well, I should say the conclusion of that knowledge (because I had been studying it for years), came in one big package right as my realization began. I felt like I was watching old home movies... I guess that's the best way to explain it. It was all suddenly extremely familiar, and I understood the purpose finally. Before that it was all esoteric or mysticism drenched nonsense. But when I had figured out what the grail was, the pyramids made perfect sense for the first time ever to me.

"What lost technique did our ancestors use to lift stones that weigh millions of pounds?"

Wally Wallington. He's the man that figure out how humans built these structures. The process takes a lot longer without giants and Yews assisting us, but the process and all of the instruction on how to do this are very simple. Like I said, you could do this by yourself, but it will go a lot faster when there are more helping. Here is a good video for a visual. <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-K7q20VzwVs> There were times that the giants "cheated," but not really during the first pyramid at all. They were much more advanced than us. It would be like an NFL team coaching a peewee league team. When given the opportunity, the NFL team is going to do some NFL stuff that the peewees just can't do. That said, it did help us pick up other techniques that went forward in Atlantis after the first cataclysm post-creation. At this point, humanity needs to focus on the basics. If these grail manufacturing facilities start pumping out tools, humanity might earn some external help. Stuff I haven't even been given. But for now, just the basics. Like I said, this will be hard word to rectify our situation. It is quite literally, humanity's penance for kicking our maker off the planet, and the only way to earn their arrival again. And even that's not guaranteed. But if it does happen, there will be no doom. He will at least be able to recognize that humanity has corrected its course.

"Our ancestors did not use machining technology like we do-- did they? I haven't imagined them using a lathe to build the Dendera Bulb/their version of the Holy Grail. Likewise, a chorus of human men singing cannot replace the effect of the Yews?"

We can mimic certain aspects of it, but Yews had a vocal range and hearing range, way beyond our capacity to discern in any natural way. There is also no scientific founded method currently that could detect the energies those beings could emit. There are aspects of it that some of us can utilize sparingly, like internal harmonic resonant capitulation, but to a Yew, those were elementary level abilities. They were well beyond our ability spectrum, and the giants were well beyond the Yews ability spectrum. Just singing in a human male tonal frequency alone, we could help them, and we did that. That specific technology is just a minor piece of the spectrum of technology that this will replace in current use.

I do not view all Satanic energy as bad or hurtful. Most of the conventional processes are useful for a variety of reasons. I do not drink alcohol if I can help it, but I do like making alcohol. Doing so also teaches a person how to make fuel, and preserve water in a desperate situation. It also teaches how to make cleaning products, essential oil extraction, and medicinal production... if that is WHY you are trying to learn about it. Most people who get into alcohol production of any kind, like drinking and getting drunk. That aspect of research is selfish, and could be considered Satanic. The process of making the alcohol itself COULD BE selfless, as long as the intent is oriented correctly. This really all comes down to each individual and why they do what they do. Consider how many alcoholic beverages are made and served every day worldwide. If just that ethanol went to fuel instead of drunkenness, a significant amount of crude oil usage could stop immediately. And not just because of the immediate ethanol production explosion. Imagine how many people would be staying home/building pyramids if there were no bars to burn crude oil in a car to drive to... All of the makeup that wouldn't get used goof powdering up the soulless sex addicts just trying to get a fix of what "good" feels like, if only for just 15 minutes. Just imagine how much fuel we would have. Abundance for all... but they have to give up drinking of their own volition.

So I cannot tell you what poisons or Satanic energies will persist or go away completely in your lifetime. What needs to be understood about Satanic energy, is that intent is everything. I do not say electricity is necessarily bad. I say that electric energy grids are not only bad, but suicidal. Energy production, and energy usage should be done at the point of usage, by the individual using it. No need for a power grid, and no need for ANYONE to not understand how to produce all of their own energy. If learning such a basic system of survival is so detrimental to the majority of brains trying to capitulate to survival itself, well then I guess you've found another group of people that should not breed. That's the harsh truth, but the truth no less. When it comes to technical processes involved with production of the Dendera sized bulbs, a variation of a lathe was used. It had two long bars that were supported in various places. There were two large cheater bars with hardened balls on the end that were made to smash the material as it went down the face of the bulb. There was a fire underneath that kept it annealed. This is probably better explained with a whiteboard... But anyways, nothing that we are using currently for machining practices should be considered wrong in any way. It's just that we should have learned these practices in the proper order, as to protect us from what has happened now. We're basically right at the feet of the giant lizard with daggers, figuratively within the depiction, and literally within the omnicide paradigm. Almost everything in the ancient's epoch was done with casting methods. Lost wax specifically. Very little machining or refinement necessary if done correctly.

"If I always felt the way I did in the cave, life would be fundamentally different."

Exactly. Now imagine everyone in the world doing this in unison... Beautiful. Your "cave" structure instead is a dedicated pyramid that sits atop your domicile with your food trees growing on the slopes. With everyone's voice added to the structure of the resonance, within a dedicated genetic purity standard for the right reasons, the sound inside will be like bathing in a fountain of youth. No need for drugs anymore. There are many different structures of waveform technology that can be used within a pyramid, be amplified by the structure itself and how it is made, and shield from external sources of wave form energies that degrade resonance points. There are sweet spots for these things. Not too loud, not too quiet, not too intrusive, etc, but these things need to be researched on a deeper level. The sound technologies that this form of a resonance bulb will aid in the use of is fuel production, stone cutting, etc. That said, everything in this material universe has a resonance structure, Determining what that structure is, whether it being to crack a walnut, or heal the sick tree that it came from, requires research into those areas, and I have not been able to partake in those specific lessons. I'd like to though. It is Divine research afterall, and fits the criteria for investigation. If the idea is to attach a large stone to break it, that seems rather simple actually, but it would take a bit of engineering and a large dedicated shop space. Otherwise yes, there are many ways to utilize this energy source. The problem is finding the right amount of vibration, the correct amount of weight to use for the tool itself, and the ability to focus that waveform energy to a focal point; the bulb itself. Then anything is really possible I suppose. I'm as excited to begin this research as soon as possible. heh, I do believe that is how we met.

"https://archive.4plebs.org/x/thread/26021851 Then he made a follow-up asking why, which also got shut down: <https://archive.4plebs.org/x/thread/26022259/>"

I was wondering why I had such a spike in the book numbers. You guys are awesome. I don't know what to say other than thank you. It sucks they're 404ing me now. It's all so tiresome...

I lol'd when you said chimpouts. I can imagine how reluctant you must be. I get it. I have eyes and can see what is happening in society. That's kind of the point for me though. This is hell. Just about everything about it clashes with me fundamentally. That's the shittiest part of the whole thing, really. Just about everyone alive has some personal reason to hate me right now, but in so doing fail to see the beauty in what I'm describing. It's sad... for them. And they don't even realize it, just steady virtue signaling onward toward omnicide. Yes indeed. Many chimpouts are expected, and niggers of all races and creeds will amass as a solid zombie like army hellbent on destroying everything... I can't guarantee success, but I will guarantee that I will not stop until I cannot go on anymore. That's exactly why I call it a mission.

I don't really know what will happen to my living situation. What I can tell you is with the cash infusion I will keep my phone on for a while longer. I do really appreciate the money you donated, but don't worry about my situation. Thank you for the money, but please keep the rest. I do not feel right accepting it while all this shit is happening here. I have enough to make the grail. That is what I will tell them too if it comes down to having to leave. There are a lot of people that have offered me a place to stay for a while for free. My first stop would probably be Nathan's to help the video production stuff get going. There's still that looming which will drive a lot of traffic. And that might open doors for quick expansion into other avenues for financial support. Maybe these fucks are going to try to ban everything I post or that is posted about me? I don't know, but I'm going to keep trying, you have my word. And I'll keep you informed of all of it. I might not have solid access to email for a while, but when I do I'll catch you up as quickly as I can. You're in the loop. And if you're ever asking yourself if this is all bullshit, ask yourself what would be the motive? Plus, how many Christ wannabe biblical and religious LARPing "prophets" told you to not worship them? Or humans in general for that matter? I also do not ever want to have sex with this body again, and hope to die having given everything away for free on my way out. I've already broken every mold the LARPing fools pretending to be me for all different forms of degeneracy, mainly money and sex. I won't reject you or whatever you're worried about. We're on the same team.

Anyways, I'm going to wrap it up. I have a plan for tomorrow but it involves driving an hour to buy sand, and I don't know if it will work or not... We got rained out today. It also rained tonight. Right now as a matter of fact. That's a no go... unless I can get dry sand. I'm going to call before I go, but I might be pouring tomorrow. It's supposed to rain then too, but you never know.

Thank you for the money, but please keep the rest. I'm serious, please keep it.
Brian

#18

#32 Overall

September 5 2020 7:57 AM

If I have lingering injuries (1+ year) am I doomed?

You're definitely not doomed, but it is something you should try to fix now. That said, there are many types of therapies that are sufficient within the parameters of current medicine. I've had many physical therapists for my injuries, and they do an adequate job given their current technology. I had laser therapy for a while after my initial injury with a specialist, that was better than expected. It's expensive, but effective. When it comes to degenerative diseases that are brought on by poor health within the individual, and not being able to escape the toxic environment that created said diseases, my advice would be to look into Georges Lakhovsky's Multiple Wave Oscillator. It too uses a resonant pulse (if done correctly) that can zero in on certain organs, or cancers and things of that nature. It uses Satanic energy in the form of high voltage electricity, meaning without an environment like a pyramid where external frequencies are quelled, the therapy is subject to those intrusions. It all depends on how much those intrusions affect the therapy itself, and how well the patient's body takes to it. Very interesting material that I studied a few years ago. He was originally from Italy and did most of his research pre, and during WW2. Most of his machines were lost to time when I first read into it. They found an original version somewhere tucked away in a basement a couple of years ago. Might be something to look into... Building one is fairly easy if you know electricity. This form of therapy can be used on many different frequency waves. This type of machine is similar to John Kanzius' machine, it just runs with a different form of energy, electricity. You can extrapolate these findings and apply them to sound, RF, gravity... John Hutchinson researched this phenomenon but was severely underfunded. Go figure. A lot of that going around.

The whole idea here is to not get into a frenzy while trading your manual labor, finite energy reserves, and most importantly, TIME... for someone else to not do their fair share. Meaning, if you want to drive a car, you need to learn how to build a car, from scratch. I've taken that so far as learning how to extract metals from ore, or other alloy sources, but let's just say from bear machining and casting parts. I am not an expert on individual processes of every individual part, but there is nothing on a car that I haven't disassembled and bought anew, or made from scratch. Having the proper tooling to make your life easier, and powering it under varying inputs, natural inputs, carbon neutral inputs. Having the ability to service all of the necessary equipment in your life to make your life fulfilling, fun, teachable. Being able to hand down information in an adequate way, with the proper dialect that you can relate to (purity comes into this), is of the utmost importance. With all of that in mind, what's going to happen in the very near future is going to be fought against by everyone alive that cannot maintain this kind of hand me down system. Everyone who has taken for granted how their food is grown, or their energy is produced, or how to maintain a vehicle of any kind and how to supply its energy, or any other version of necessity in modern life functionality, will become enraged at how our people will not do that anymore. The system of the future will be smaller communities that will self segregate, but interconnect with their fellow peoples of other communities. The information will flow, but the individual communities will have to supply all means of sustainability. The grid tied power system is in hospice right now. The labor that comes with maintenance alone of the grid is not worth the energy we spend for it, and that's before speaking about the impact to the environment DURING, and post usage.

Ethanol, especially cellulosic ethanol, can rid people of a centralized energy system once and for all. The United States has wasted 13 years this far, not telling humanity about the science, and letting the research take place on a more varied playing field. Just switching feed stocks into a more energy dense crop in regions where they grow better, and allowing the land to dictate the crop instead of mass producing shit in areas to appease diet fads. All of these stresses that people will have to deal with head on, will bring with it some sort of collapse. Humanity is already seeing the first few waves of this happening now. After that chaos dies down, and people build their communities based on involvement in the community and the purity ideals as the glue that binds them (real love), the outlook on the future will shift to a more appreciative disposition. Slowly but surely, the stresses will fade, the "old" ways of trying to impress each other for acceptance, basing all idolatry on looks and wasted artful injections into a zeitgeist that is in hell... all for fame and money will end, and the people will learn how to transcend. This whole thing is not going to be an immediate switch, unless something drastic happens human wide... But I'm saying that when it does, and the progeny have lived an entire life from conception to death with the methodology of life that I am trying to revive, small injuries and big injuries will be exceedingly rare. Most people push themselves in ways that hurt their body, I know I am "1" of them, but my injuries were based on humanity as a whole's success. Personally fueled injuries and injuries that happen due to a mass production environment designed to be profitable over safe and sustainable, will cease to exist. All I can say is that the pyramid technologies on the level that I am trying to explain have numerous qualities and functions available, BUT... getting to a point of using one is what's important now. The dangerous aspects of society still exist, and must be dealt with. It would be a lot quicker transition if these communities started forming now, and going off the grid immediately food/water/energy/money wise. However, as noted numerous times, it seems purity and the reason to preserve it are fought against vehemently, and nobody wants to stop using money. Why? They can't take care of themselves. They have no idea how to sustain life without money. Slaves to the dollar.

As I said, these situations that cause these problems to exist is why I am doing what I am doing. I am not trying to cure symptoms. I am trying to cure the disease, selfishness. Among many other things, but ya know. Anyways, I'll show you the MWO videos and will broadly recommend this channel that I enjoy watching. It's full of great information and the young man does a good job of explaining stuff.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=yQ47qx1MkBU> Georges Lakhovsky

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kiwEWcPx8JA> I haven't seen this, but I was put through it and It worked better than drugs.

<https://www.youtube.com/user/TheRedNile> This guy has a round about way of teaching what cellulosic ethanol is as well. I've recommended him before... https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=v-mWK\_kcZMs

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ogcv9xS8Pkw> David Blume. The guy that taught me a significant amount of ethanol production information. I've read his book, Alcohol Can Be A Gas, several times. His newer video is updated, but even now, he does not try to delve into cellulosic ethanol <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=U-iWgbWiP48>

"In The Way you said that no one can healthily be vegetarian 100% of the time except you. To gain the ability to eschew meat healthily, does a human need to achieve transcendence to a point where they partially are nourished by manna?"

Even I cannot fully sustain that ability. As I've said, now it is getting more and more difficult to procure certain abilities. My consumerism is very low, but I use a high fat and sugar diet to sustain my body. I only eat once a day, but when I do, it's fatty. Surviving on manna and water alone is what I did during and just after my realization. It was strange in that my body was physically rejecting any sustenance other than water for almost a month. I feel better when I fast as well, but I do not recommend anyone doing that, at least not the way I did/do. There will be a time when the human body will require very little direct nourishment from the environment, but now is not that time. There is far too much work that needs to be done, and vegans cannot sustain it. My body could at that time, but that time has passed, and whatever usage this deteriorated vessel is worth now I sit in should be utilized for a manual labor variety... if I can. It's getting harder and harder, but I'm trying. If I was purely vegan and trying to raise cattle, chickens, goats, and recyclable critters such as worms, fish, and anything for cellulosic enzyme production, that could not happen. Nor would my body be able to build and produce pyramids, or pyramids... at least not without a fully functioning crude oil economy taking up the slack.

It is a simple EROEI equation when it comes to vegans. They have to force their body to process more material and with a less variable energy density than that of an omnivore. Vegans only exist because of an emotional tie to animals that is entirely selfish in disposition, and/or bad computation data from climate (((scientists))). Almost always, there is some element of sadness equated into the reasoning in a vegan's head for being vegan. It's as if there is an emotional ploy driven by them to "not hurt animals," when in reality, they are saying kill off the animals we have now so their farts don't destroy the ozone. I am in the process of learning regenerative grazing right now. When you are a farmer, your job is to take care of the land. Without its health, there is no land. Before cattle farming fenced off tornado alley, hundreds of millions of animals were in the cattle's place. All shitting and farting methane. So what is the goal of being vegan in today's society, if that is the case? Anyways, the majority of the excrement goes to feeding dung beetles and other various shit eaters, who feed the smaller reptiles that aerate and permeate the soil. Regenerative grazing cattle takes care of all levels of the local ecosystem, and grows the healthiest form of protein on Earth currently. I suggest looking into a friend of mine, Weldon Warren's story for the direct scientific method founded research from a cattleman himself. It's as if vegans would like to destroy the cattle raising/ecosystem replacement from the decimation of bison... and replace it with plowed, genetically altered (because that's the only way to veganise the entirety of humanity), watered from an almost dried up reservoir, crops of monoculture waste that can be processed into heavy carbohydrate substances and pushed through a processing system that is entirely run on crude oil. Animal food is definitely necessary right now, and for a long time to come. Vegetarians and vegans were sold a bullshit story heavily drenched in emotional plights and dishonesty about motives. The land functioned fine when it was full of animals before humans inhabited it, and during... if the economic system in place was gone.

Humans, in the current form cannot survive entirely on manna. Man N/A... We can use it in the interim, but access has to be granted from humanity's maker first and foremost, then a massive complex of interconnected communities needs to replace the shit in society now, and we must all commit to being stewards of our biosphere, not pillagers on the fucking rampage trying to convert it into dollar bills... then maybe, a significant amount of people can start to experience these abilities, but before that can even occur, the communities must be built to sustain their population. The easiest way to do that is outlaw hair dye, makeup, plastic surgery, money, and any other forms of tricking men and women into breeding with external genetic bases. Sustaining an animal food farm is not difficult when scaled down. The relationships with the animals is close and caring. The problem is not animal consumption, the problem is unmitigated sexual exploitation at every level of society, which has created an ever growing population base that couldn't take care of themselves if their life depended on it... literally. The overpopulation is what is responsible for the mass production of food animals and a complete dissociation with where their food is raised. It causes a production line scenario where the emotion is removed. The cattlemen I know care deeply for their herds. It's insane to assume otherwise because their jobs would be very difficult if they didn't. The feed lots, and grain producers that feed the millions of worthless Satanic economy clogs are not necessarily being mean, but rather just filling a void brought on by a selfish attitude from the general populace. People in society that are just for beef, no questions asked, are wrong. Vegans are also wrong. The middle ground of sustainable equilibrium is everyone that eats meat plays a part in raising it. If veganism is what is craved, good luck finding nutrients for your crops when the ammonia nitrate sourced from the crude oil economy is gone and the nitrogen starts to be consumed without animal excrement replacing it. If vegans thought this situation all the way through, they would have to admit that killing all the animals is the only way to sustain that WANT... AND they would have to admit that a highly connected mass production line with all components fueled with crude oil is also necessary. That is the only viable way to sustain veganism human wide... especially when building an entire planet of pyramids is on the horizon. In other words it is not a sustainable method of human production.

This vegan thing gets to me for a variety of reasons. The biggest one being how vegans became vegans. The reasons behind why people choose these things, and the superiority complex fueled by an egotistical selfish disposition that accompanies those stories, is a perfect representation of emotion over logic. The entire system was not properly thought through. Vegans stopped at the slaughtering section, allowed their emotions to control the equation progress, and filled in the information that correlated to their ill conceived theories. In short, veganism is bad science. Which is ironic because so many vegans try to assume the posture as educated. Methane is bad, yes. But as I explained in my previous email, we can extract the source of that methane before consumption by the food animal takes place and greatly reduce the methane, without reducing nutrient uptake by the animal. It's called DDGS, and David Blume does a great job of explaining the science behind this process. Again, we can do this same thing on a cellulosic extraction level, and multiply the amount of ethanol usage tremendously. There is no logical reason to stop consuming food animals. There are however, many reasons why the process of raising animals should change drastically and immediately, but none of those reasons are emotionally derived, and none of them call for a reduction in animal food sources.

<https://www.holycowbeef.com/about> Weldon's website.

Harmonic, because it emits from the human voice. Resonant because you are tying the resonant structure of that voice to a specifically created for that voice object (The Holy Grail [and as you already know looks like a cup]). And yes. Micro Cavitation because the interaction between the plate and stone should be facilitated by water of some type (for fine detail, a proper vacuum seal, and a steady cut), to produce very small cavitation bubbles that erode the stone quickly, kind of like massaging it away. As opposed to blowing it up, or fracturing it in some other violent fashion (hammers, jack hammers, saw, etc). Harmonic Resonant Micro Cavitation, in that order for those reasons. That's the technical terminology. There has been a group of purely academics that have uncovered a significant portion of this technology, but not as broad OR in depth as I have. They call it Archaeoacoustics. From what I understand this group of people are more hippyish or hipsterish in their intent, and less practical and pragmatic. Plus, I doubt that they have utilized resonance as the primary power amplifier, and I'm almost certain they have not tied that structure into solid workable tooling to prove their theories and hypotheses. They're worth a look on YouTube if you have the time. I haven't looked into their progress in quite a while. It would be interesting if they had tied all of this together by now. I wonder if they too would spontaneously "wake up" like I did. Anything's possible I guess, but still unlikely.

"Is this any indication on how humans should prepare their own food?"

I wouldn't recommend it unless needed. There are some things in life that should be enjoyed, and food is one of them for now. Food is a stress reliever if prepared correctly. Cattle have a much different digestive system than a human. Most plant eating species do. We should utilize their digestive system microbes to produce the correct enzymes for cellulosic ethanol production, but we shouldn't design our diets based on what their diets are. Their digestive system is the perfect biomimicry platform for transforming cellulose into sugar for their body's fuel. We just need to replicate what their stomachs are doing and cellulosic ethanol production will be everywhere. It's not an easy process, but it is sustainable and keeps the methane producing substances in animal food to a minimum. There might be a few reasons to correlate our diets, but fermenting the sugar out of our food is a bit extreme and would not offer the same benefits. Cows are vegan and they function just fine. They have 4 stomachs and regurgitate their stomach contents back into their mouths to further breakdown the materials, though (chew the cud). Just a slight difference, heh.

"On a related note, what should be done with human feces? Is the current way of transporting it all to either a sewage system or septic tank the best for environment health? I'm inclined to think not, since pooping in water contaminates it, and I don't know that this poop ever decomposes properly."

I like the idea of microbe conversion, which is more or less how it is dealt with now, however, the nutrient base should be diverted to usage with ethanol stocks that are built to withstand that nutrient punch. Same with runoff from animal excrement. Build many different wading type pools that graduate the nutrients downward to something like cattails. Again, David Blume's book goes into depth with the various types of feedstocks for the different regions of farming. You're much further North than I am currently, so you could grow sugar beets and cattails. Both highly useful for cleaning water from human intrusion, and growing the methane induced ethanol before it becomes methane in easily accessible starch ethanol stocks. Then, if you've built your system to utilize cellulosic ethanol, the rest of the plant can be utilized for cellulosic production... or you could use the material in a gasifier. There are many biomass plants in the NE USA, I would guess. Same thing. Just learn the process and scale down. The great thing about cattails is the rhizomes. You don't have to replant after harvest. David Blume is much more elegant at explaining these things than I am, and researching cellulosic ethanol is difficult at best. It's just not talked about (((for some reason))). What most county, and state maintenance ordinances instruct to do now is chemically kill them. Not only do the taxes we pay for go to destroying a perfectly viable, abundant, naturally occurring plant that has massive potential to fuel especially rural areas, but we also poison the environment, and destroy natural cover for amphibians and other small animals. It would take a significant effort to dig the necessary wading pools but it would pay off twice. The water down stream would be a lot cleaner, and you would break into, and be able to utilize, a naturally occurring sustainable portion of the entire planet's carbon dioxide cycle loop. And nary a creature comfort was lost... Equilibrium with every portion accounted for in the carbon dioxide cycle loop, and no real loss of fuel... But definitely a drop in methane production. At least current methane production.

"What is farming water? Search engines are not helpful so far, so I am trying to imagine what this would be. Making natural water sources palatable by cleaning them? Identifying natural water sources that already are palatable and utilizing them? Constructing wells?"

Great questions. The way I picture farming water is utilizing a very small battery operated system that is tied to a hygrometer and an air pressure tank release, Storing excess energy in air pressure tanks from small closed systems of wind and solar inputs. The air tank itself would be the battery, meaning the wind system or solar system could be free of electricity completely. An important distinction to make because there is a loss of energy when mechanical energy is made into electricity, and electrical systems are subject to cataclysmic events like a Carrington event. Anyways, the air pressure stored up would run a pump that would either pump water directly from the source, or separate from it to mitigate loss, to a depth underground where the temperature would stay below the surface. Then condensation would do the rest. You'd put your coil for collection on pontoons so it would stay just above the surface. In winter, this is also possible on the inverse. Since your depth of temperature exchange should be set to a depth that remains constant, you could use your stored air pressure energy to keep a source liquid. This is the same strategy on a geothermal home, but I would use it for condensation collection. I'm in Oklahoma, and they have enormous amounts of wind here, high humidity, but not much rain. My originally planned idea was to use the top of pyramids for wind power collection straight into a pump, and the pool would be at the top slowly trickling downward toward all of the plants I'd like to grow on the slopes. It would collect into a moat that would be on the three northern facing slopes bases. The moat water would be the basis for my aquaponic system and it would help clean runoff water.

All of that is based on an ever running system with very little maintenance that is highly efficient and purely mechanical. This is the type of system that should be used for each community I was referring to. Slowly but surely people will figure out the different systems that produce this stored energy and how to utilize it. When wind is way down, use the stored up ethanol, etc etc. Implementing these systems will clean the environment and account for all of the human intrusion, but are very difficult to justify doing en masse. They make sense on a community level, but not a city level. Those are the methods that should be looked into for farms especially, right now. Considering what is happening with the Oglala and San Joaquin reservoirs, and how much food those areas produce, those farmers better save their own asses now. This isn't the type of water production that will be huge and river producing at first, but it could get there in those areas at certain times. For a domicile, I would siphon water off of the moats and streams into an underground facility where I would have my scaled up Nitinol engine running a cavitation water heater for steam. I'd use the steam energy on a variation of Robert Green's steam engine design for various purposes. For me mainly machining like this fine gentleman...

<https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCBdj-vOveiEFWe3vnGoJUag> David Richards is his name and he has resorted to perfect working condition, a 100% steam powered machine shop. This again would be a good use for biomass conversions from left over waste material from ethanol production, or when your trees are past productive stages. I would like to produce the bulk of this steam energy from a cavitation system powered by a Nitinol engine, though. The strands would need to be long, and woven together because of the fragility, but that is based on early data. There is an alloy possibility I've been considering trying, but the foundry process is complex for Nitinol. Every atom of titanium (Nitinol is 50% Titanium and 50% Nickel) that interacts with carbon or oxygen robs it from the mixture, and Nitinol has delicate tolerances. This means the process needs to be done in a vacuum chamber, with electricity as the melting agent. Induction melting, arc melting, etc. Once the process is mastered, which it already has, the maintenance concerns become a breeze to deal with, plus it gives other opportunities for complex alloys that are air oxidation sensitive. That's the kind of stuff I was building when all of this Christ situation happened. I'm a pretty busy guy, even when I'm forced to sit on my ass. I was just about to machine the cavitation water heater element, and my dog's leg started hurting him. It was walking him gingerly and building a ramp for the truck I owned when I had conceptualized the Holy Grail. I have a picture taken of it that I showed my now ex wife when I finished the ramp, just before we went out to dinner that Friday. Anyways, this was what I was doing when I became the Christ. I also have a wind generator upgrade that I was building the molds for. I was going to construct them of recycled milk jug tops, melted into wind generator sectional pieces. Horizontal not vertical. I really don't want to try to explain it like this and confuse you. It's better left to a whiteboard kind of conversation.

So, in essence, when I say farming water, I mean it from many different functions, and that is before I even talk about hydrogen production. That too should be engineered into the Nitinol motor. It should be reiterated, even though you've probably read this before, I am not talking about a small strand YouTube style Nitinol engine here. If that is the most economical production way, and my alloy idea doesn't work, the strands will be upwards of 40 feet long, with a few hundred fibers per strand. The torque would be slower but much more energy dense. I would gear up the speed through a simple gear that would be connected to the cavitation water heater to run at optimum speed. It too would be much larger than the YouTube version. If you were to get in the way of one of these strands flexing back unabated by the motor resistance itself, it would probably cut you in half. We're talking some serious torque. Very powerful. On that note, one of the steam engines could be dedicated to powering an HHO or just Hydrogen generator. I also have several upgrades to what I just said, but that kind of requires a whiteboard. I'd need to draw this out to properly explain it. The cavitation water heater and steam produced from it distill your water, by the way. Which is one of the few methods of removing radiation. There are also properties of cavitation that cleanse water in various ways. Although I would need to research this in real time for an accurate measurement of the total dissolved solids before and after cavitation, that is research that I don't think I'll have time for. Maybe...

It should be of note that when it comes to humidity being a problem indoors, and rejuvenating water, Johann Grander. I am not familiar with the rejuvenating water properties, but the humidity machines that function in a completely passive way sound fascinating to me. I'd like to study that further, but again, that is one of those things I just couldn't get to. Nonetheless, his studies are valid, and should be utilized moving forward in the home, and environment. Viktor Schauberger's work is also of note here. Many of these things are just simply not taught to anyone in any form of academia. Much less cavitation systems and resonance. One form of cavitation that should be used on a much larger scale but for smaller communities are hydraulic ram pumps for water storage and elevated micro hydro plants. A simple float valve rigged to fill and release similar to how a toilet flushes and you have a cavitation water pump powered micro hydro plant, off grid and autonomous. Wasteful, but only in drought areas. Up north, I'm sure there are all kinds of sources for hydraulic ram pumps or just plain old micro hydro. Again, the mechanical energy from the micro hydro plant could be directly connected to a cavitation water heater, or geared up/down for the optimal speed. I've seen most of this guy's videos, and have used them to explain to others what I was planning in Oregon for my property there. This particular video shows how much torque and power can be achieved. If the draw from the generator was instead put into a cavitation water heater sequence, the power could be amplified greatly and several steam engines could run easily, along with siphoning heat for the domicile, all while cleaning water for your aquaponic farm and refeeding vapor to your collection system on top of the pyramid. Just to reiterate, cavitation water heaters, when made large enough to suffice, are over unity/Divine. They should be added into any system that draws power, but it must be done at the individual level, and used for mechanical energy over electrical energy. THAT is the whole point here. Yes, use electricity on a closed system small scale way, but DO NOT build a system that relies on it. Might be a break in the ability to use it coming up shortly. I can neither confirm nor deny...

"What does this mean? It sounds like we are choking on the fire's smoke now?"

If I remember correctly I was talking shit to somebody about the sequences problems associated with peak oil. In crude oil's earlier days, especially in the Permian Basin (mostly Texas) and Ghawar in Saudi Arabia, the crude oil was called light sweet crude. The "sweet" refers to the sulfur content. The higher the sulfur content the more energy is required to refine it, and that is the basis for the decline in EROEI that peak oil is actually referring to. Tar sands, shale, etc, all have high levels of detrimental elements to the refinement process, and those refinement process are at or below 1:1 EROEI right now, when disposing of those toxins are accounted for. (((Thankfully for Chevron's stock prices, most people think a gallon of gasoline costs about 2-4 dollars))), but when the clean up costs, and the military protecting the supply chain costs, and the inevitable swap from gasoline to ethanol or hydrogen (possibly methane/natural gas in some remote situations) costs are all added up, a gallon of gasoline costs closer to 20-25 dollars a gallon. But those costs are hidden in the taxes that everyone pays every year without really knowing where it goes. Well now you know. It goes to supplement and supply the enormous network of protectors of the oil economy, and everyone who makes money from that specific energy source. As the source deteriorates from light sweet crude to some deteriorated version the sulfur content rises, meaning more is burned to refine it. THAT'S RIGHT! the worse off the quality gets, the more we have to burn to refine it, and that equation never stops deteriorating. I mean, that's exactly why the USA is even trying to refine tar sands and shale. It's because the light sweet crude is drying up. Hydraulic fracturing is just more evidence that peak oil has already occurred. It's just a shame that nobody really understands it. I studied Marion King Hubbert's own research, and several opinions that correlated to the data. I'm very well versed in what peak oil is and it's always somebody that doesn't know what the science behind the research is, means, or how to correlate the data. Most people don't even know how gasoline is made, but that won't stop them from commenting on it. It's always amusing to me though, because they're not really arguing with me, they're arguing with M. King Hubbert himself. It's his research I'm using. But yeah, the longer we use oil, the more the quality degrades, ultimately meaning the more sour/sulfur rich the toxins from refinement become. And it just keeps multiplying... every day. The fire hasn't stopped in over 100 years, and now... it is EVERYWHERE.

"Where did you buy the sand from?"

Amazon got it here the fastest so I went with them. The closest local supplier was in Kansas City and there was a minimum order involved, like a whole pallet. I asked for Shane's advice, and he said just go with the sure thing.

"That is the particular way in which women are dumb, to reference what I said in a previous e-mail."

Dumb, too, is subjective. Everyone alive has an ability to formulate a purpose within a Divine order like The Hierarchy of this universe. Women are not "dumb" as in their brains cannot function at a high level. Women lack a fundamental ability to utilize logic as a tool during high stress situations. Politics, especially in hell where war and split decisions up to the second require a cool head that needs to make life or death choices where even his own is at stake... should be left to a seasoned mind belonging to a man. Likewise, when complex ideals that require a hardened heart to formulate a solution to are required to be devoid of emotional intrusion, women lack the ability to be logical over empathetic. The Vegan thing that I explained above is a prime example. The entire animal food process and the implements that it provides are lost to the equation because of an inherent lack of putting the whole's benefit and continuity above a personal vendetta against all killing of all things that are going to die regardless. Nathan asked me to watch a movie called Endgame 2050. I did. And that was what the whole damn thing boiled down to, an emotionally charged outcry to stop killing animals that the woman doctor was fond of. The emotional ties to manipulating and misconstruing hard scientific data is why the scientific community cannot be trusted right now. This infection has spread uncontrollably since feminism dug its claws in. There are lots of positions in society where the best fit for the job is a man and it will always work out better that way. There's no reason to try to dumb down the standard of anything just to make a woman feel "empowered." As I said in a previous email, all that does is waste an already dwindling finite energy supply. We burn more fuel, because standards are lowered to include everyone.

Women can and do mimic men in various scenarios quite well. Generally speaking, though, leadership positions where women are in charge of distributing information to a justifiably rowdy and manly group of guys, does not go over well. It's difficult to respect people that cannot perform the task they are assigned to teach or maintain. When women enter into the workforce in some positions of manual labor, the quality or efficiency suffers to that of a full man crew. It's just that way. We were made for hard labor and most of us enjoy it. It's also quite fun saying jokes with the guys free and clear of women getting offended by them. All of this is not ubiquitous. There are women that are anomalous and excel at these types of professions, but the exception proves the rule, it doesn't signify the implied ideology of equality between men and women. Women can excel at leadership positions designed for a passive positionary stance. Where manual labor, war, politics, is not the focal point. Allowing men to be men is in everyone's best interest. The intrusion of women into every institution designed specifically for men in existence has caused a massive inefficiency to permeate everything as old rules based on logic are replaced by whiny emotionally derived, subjective assessments of women's opinions. Women are not dumb, or stupid, or any of that. They are best suited for lives outside of heavy stress positions. In those positions, women are a liability to themselves, and everyone they are in charge of. Standards are lowered to include them, quality suffers, and more energy is wasted to bridge the gap. More burning everywhere... just to make sure every woman can be included in any job.

One of the positions I worked where I fucked up my hand, was a glass bottle forming operator, mechanic, and machine repairman. It was a very hot job where molten bottles came out of machines that ran at speeds of 500 bottles a minute or more. When the plug ups got bad, they were really bad. Very dangerous with an almost guaranteed injury occurrence. Every so often through my years there a woman would try to be an apprentice. They rarely lasted much longer than a couple plug ups and blank changes (600+ degree molds). The reason, and I tried to be as polite as possible when doing this, is that their tits would burn. Literally. Every guy with a big belly also had that problem... but they could stick it out. Not women. Reaching over a bottle line moving at that speed with 1000 degree heat just a couple inches from the torso causes blisters and heat rash... on the closest region to the bottles, the nipples.

Uniforms catching on fire in that region even on men was a regular thing. Anyways, all of that was well understood by everyone who worked there, but it never failed. A woman would try out, cause all kinds of plug up and damage to try to be like one of us, throwing thousands of dollars away in lost time and more often than not causing burns on the men that inevitably had to save their ass, just because of their ego. Still, I would assume that no woman would be able to handle that job, period. There weren't any there when I was a journeyman machine repairman, and that was in Portland. Ground zero of feminist cancerous ideology. That's just one example of many out there that are similar. We waste so much time on the selfish ego driven ideas of equality when there is no such thing as equality.

I'm not saying women are stupid at all. I'm saying that feminism is flawed in numerous ways, basically all ways. There are many different ways that women can utilize their strengths without causing an inefficiency. Women need to put their egos in the trash, along with men. And both sexes should do what they were made to do. Many women understand this. Many men do not. All of these people who let their virtue signaling define their behavior have very difficult lessons to learn in the near future. A more traditional setup is inevitable. Certain things will have to be done in a certain way just because of the duties that will be addressed when the self segregated communities form. Uppity loud mouthed, over opinionated women who try to preach dominance will have their bluffs called. Talk time and hollow word salad will be useless. What people produce will matter, not how loud they can make their voice heard. It will benefit women to return to a more traditional role, lest they will have to do all manual labor requirements for running a sustainable system AND protect themselves from rogue factions. Same with effeminate men. They too will have nothing to offer after a collapse. Strong, hard working, dedicated, focused and protective men will need to be the focal point. Women should be happy about this, by the way. The men have to do all the hard work. The natural state of the nuclear family is the solution. Feminism directly attacked that stable and natural state of child rearing... and as a result, have landed humanity in hell, without humanity even realizing it. Both men and women are to blame. I'm not blaming everything on women. Women fucked up by wanting equality. Men fucked up by allowing the dysfunction to continue to this point. It would be nice if both men and women allowed nature/humanity's maker and the Nine Principles' system to function as it was intended. Nobody is really stupid... People are all just consumed by selfishness on all levels. Ego being the most prominent.

I also do not discriminate when speaking to each individual sex. There's no reason to. You found me, and listened to the reason and logic over the emotional traps I set in the book. You're "smarter" than most men if that's the criteria. Don't sell your brain short... just don't try to be a politician or glass molder apprentice, heh. Beyond awakening women will be far superior to the masses still "sleeping." BUT!!! That means it's your job to help them exceed you and your abilities. Holding that superiority within as a tool to insert dominance would just be ego driven nonsense/selfish. Consider what I am doing right now just by writing these emails and keeping up on my book... My hope is that the people in the future will exceed this knowledge. It doesn't matter if it's a woman or a man... just that it gets exceeded. If everyone were doing this, feminism and the bullshit that comes with it wouldn't even be a thing at all. Everyone would just be working for the betterment of the whole, not to prove something to the self. Everyone needs to focus on the real problems at hand. This selfishness shit is why we're all in hell right now. There literally is no benefit to it.

I hope I got to everything. I'm still trying to write the book so it might be a few days between these emails, but I'll keep checking them.

Brian

#19

#33 Overall

September 5 2020 8:49AM

Forgot to add this video to the section above...

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zFdyqTGx32A> Micro hydro plant that could be used to power a cavitation water heater. Very inexpensive and reliable.

#20

#36 Overall

September 9 2020 1:46AM

"Is it possible to simplify all the issues with veganism into one, which is scale?"

Scale itself can only be accomplished if the environment, including the entire planet's biosphere, can maintain an atmospheric loop cycle. Carbon dioxide, oxygen, and nitrogen especially. What building a pyramid as your domicile does just from practical standpoint, is triple the foot space. Vegetables, fruits, and various other plants will grow all over it, if you design it that way. Being a Vegan when that has already taken place on a large enough scale that you can feel comfortable and safe from theft or war... is a strong possibility. There is a lot that needs to occur in order for that reality to start taking shape. As I've said prior, being a Vegan in today's society is only possible from a heavily subsidized crude oil economy. The amount of produce that flies all over the world and/or gets shipped on a boat, transported to the holding facility, shipped to a distributor, then shipped from the distributor to the grocery store. But wait, there's more... Then the buyer of the produce has to drive their vehicle to and from work, then to and from the grocery store. Unless there is an onboard aquaponics system in place that is run on pure solar, off grid, that can maintain light variations to keep the vegetables growing all year round, every single Vegan NEEDS the crude oil economy to function. When it comes to a community, absolutely not.

No matter what happens to the societal complex on Earth, outlaws will exist for quite some time. People that will try to destroy you in all manner of ways. Maybe even just for fun. There's some sick people out there, that's just the harsh truth. Some of them are not easy to see, as I've proven several times just on this journey alone. Creating one of these communities must take the utmost scrutiny. Hence, the constant harping on purity and selflessness. Within a tight community where awkward boundaries of racial disparity are constant, there is a view of individualism. Removing that immediate stigma only has "1" route, and that is self segregation. Not forced. This is what everyone chooses to do of their own volition. With a strong possibility of that scenario NOT likely... self defense, stamina, and an opportunistic diet with a diverse menu will be important. Have you seen that show Alone? I watched it recently and the contestants that were Vegans HAD TO eat meat to survive. It would be very difficult to build, cultivate, harvest, and protect an organic Vegan community at any scale... without a significant amount of crude oil, solar energy, wind, etc to subsidize. At very least there would be a milk cow right? Butter, cream, milk, cheese, right? That kind of a diet requires a large section of land just to produce the milk. Plus you need to have a bull to impregnate, just to get the milk started. Could an entire community of Vegans assemble and maintain a sustainable complex with what is coming? My gut feeling is no fucking way.

The Earth can deal with animal waste in a variety of ways. In addition, the animals themselves can do the extra work when needed, or they can be dedicated to work full time. For a Vegan community that is strictly dependent on foot space to grow their entire sustenance from, any additional animal is a massive drag on that availability. On the flipside, where regenerative grazing techniques are being used, the land can sustain itself with a little engineering help from the animal husbandry expert. I've often wanted to call them that, farmers, ranchers, cattlemen, goat herders, chicken farmers. What if, and I stress what if... every time a cattleman or farmer got referenced by a proVegan syndicate they used that nomenclature? Just a thought, but I digress. It's much easier to form communities based on cattle production because the vegetable patches are patches, not fields. The cattle are not only a very good source of protein, they are literally the life support for the land. The entire animal can be used for a variety of things. I used to give the bones to my dog. He loved the marrow. The hides make convenient things... like SHOES. It's also very difficult to infiltrate a tight community and steal cows. They're big, have brands, know their owner and raise a fuss just on their own. There are millions of reasons to utilize animals for food, and many other things. Scale itself is the most obvious. There is no way at all to say that Veganism is a viable solution to the population problem maintaining sustainability.

How many Vegans buy at least half of their groceries from a store? After the collapse, where will that half of their complete nutritional sustenance come from? The farmers that supplement those local shortages have run out (or almost run out) of reservoir water. Their want and desire to supplement a supply system that does not benefit them or their land will evaporate, plus they'll be busy saving their own asses. Really process this scenario. Living in a heaven like scenario on Earth where sustainability is easy is a ways off. Focus on the present dilemma, and then view that dilemma from everyone else's eyes. That is the obstacle. I obviously cannot make anyone eat meat, nor can I make anyone survive... All I can say right now, is that Veganism is a virtue signaling blowhard solution to a survivability equation. It is impossible to sustain without a complex system of external energy funding its circulation. Therefore, any past epoch representations of Veganism being sustainable, required a civilization backing it. The one currently is crude oil. Veganism also requires supplements (vitamins and nutrients) that cannot be produced without a crude oil economy powering the infrastructure. It's a fad in a time where the planet is dying, and everyone wants to think they have a solution to a complex problem. Veganism is not a solution to the trophic web collapsing right now, and is selfish in inception as a result. The problems I tackle are global. Meaning they are complex solutions that benefit every human alive. What Vegans are saying by promoting their ideology as a global solution, is they do not understand what the problem is right now, how to get beyond the era of said problem, and how to sustain life FAR beyond the life they themselves are living. Veganism is a ploy to the present state of a personally derived rationale in a time of great confusion and complex problems. It may seem like a solution to the self... but the whole reason why humanity is in hell is because of the self in the first place. I see the effort and the reasoning. I see the good intention, I really do. It's misplaced, simple as. If that is offensive, I think that should be taken up with your maker. It's his system. Not mine... and certainly not a Vegan's.

I've never heard of a Vegan Amish. And yes, I am very familiar with Belgian horses, the Amish go to work horse. The problem with comparing modern society to the Amish is that it is a very strict and difficult community to enter into. They have self segregated for hundreds of years now. They already protect themselves and police themselves. When the collapse ensues, they will be vulnerable in a variety of ways, but they will stick it out. How many Vegans live in anything remotely close to that now, though? They've been at this game for hundreds of years, and Vegans just started to make a footprint recently, much less formed self sustaining, self defending communities. If the Amish are looking at taking losses, what does that say about Vegans? The other problem that hasn't been discussed is viability. Being a Vegan makes the body itself a liability in times of shortage. Is the entire community going to be subject to the deteriorating abilities of citizens that choose to not eat bacon, or burgers? Those that do eat meat will continue being able to work at full capacity, or at least more so than a Vegan. What would a Vegan say to that dereliction? What if the Vegan was the only doctor in the community? Would he starve himself of sustenance in times where only meat is available... possibly dying and forcing the entire community to live there forward without healthcare... And for what? This isn't just about some principled ideology standing out from the rest. This situation is about survivability, community, adaptability, and cohesion. Everyone eats what everyone eats, thusly, forming what humans refer to as "culture." That's where it all begins. Being a Vegan at all means that you would like to separate from your community in some way... any way. Which is an attack on cohesion itself. The ide here is to work as a team, not an individual.

"Overall the truly important question is whether there are environmentally healthy ways of growing plants and if so, what are all of the details involved in doing so."

Like I explained above, once the civilization is founded upon equilibrium, sustainability, and cohesion, being a Vegan will probably be the norm just because of the lack in required physical labor and self defense strategies. That COULD BE a few generations into the future, or it could take thousands of years to appear, or it may never happen. The opportunity for a self sustaining Vegan community in the near future is close to zero. Not because of the ability for it to occur, but more so because of the lack in ability to sustain. I am a very big supporter of aquaponics. I had a very nice set up that I was planning installing myself before this all started. But even that requires meat to produce in any meaningful way. Plants to animals, and animals to plants. In a world of dwindling resources and starvation on the horizon, the animals must play a role in sustenance. They are imperative to sustaining any kind of land production. As far as the land goes, that will all depend on how much water you can produce. The water availability will decide how many animals any plot can sustain. That's why I'm also a huge supporter of water farming in those areas. Water is the largest factor in any land viability solution, other than aquaponics ironically. After the pyramids get built, I would build planter boxes, yes. I'm not too sure where the piezoelectric hypothesis started or why they think that particular motive exists for those structures, but that picture I posted some time ago is how I would design the gardens. Yes.

"When and why did our ancestors start farming?"

This kind of a question needs to be a bit more refined to properly answer. The maturation of modern humanity's gene structure went through numerous changes over a very long period of time. Before our maker created the modern version by upgrading several versions of those spread out genetic structures, upright hominids had several uses for "farming" or agriculture. By and large these tribes of very early humans gathered their people around these naturally growing food sources. Herds of wild animals dictated their movements to sustain themselves, but it also taught them how to find vegetative foods and water. Along the way it was picked up that seeds birth plants, and thusly, the beginning stages of agriculture began to form. Their crops were mainly fruit trees, wheat, and primitive versions of several starches (potatoes, palm hearts, etc). The modern version of vegetable farming did not take shape until our genetics were upgraded and we were taught animal husbandry. The domestication of our food animals was what gave the incentive to farm vast swaths of fields, and we did it to feed them. Really, before that event arrived, the process of growing all food in a domestic setting was unheard of and didn't exist. Full blown domestication, which is what I'm assuming you're referring to, did not begin until civilization began, or 36,000-40,000 years ago, specifically.

The earliest crops were designed to domesticate and supplement animals. The first consumable crops at a large scale were based on their ability to produce fermented sugars/beer, wine, and spirits. This process started with wheat and barley that was originally intended to feed the animals. From fermentation practices of making beer, the process of making bread arrived. They are essentially identical, in fact, most bread bakeries have distilling setups in their ventilation systems to capture the ethanol made during production. As palets evolved, additives were wanted for the beer and wine. That was the incentive to domesticate plants for human consumption. To give a steady supply, at home, to the newly found consumption standards and newly formed complex palets. As far as raising vegetables en masse to feed a complex society trying to be strictly Vegan? That is a new one... Without an animal protein diet at a young age, genetics do not mature at the same pace as those who do consume animal foods. If Veganism ever did happen in the past, the population was destroyed and the remaining people were enslaved. Meaning they did not leave a lasting legacy that on any kind of memorable timescale.

Humanity wants to assume that agriculture was evolved into, but without direct intervention to upgrade genetic structures in humans themselves, a more violent and unruly mass would have sustained. So... technically speaking, the first real "agriculture" on Earth were humans themselves. Meaning, humans are the first real GMO crop. After my other lessons on what humans are feeding, this shouldn't be a difficult connection to make. When the real ancient Egypt was birthed, and humanity was given the most recent upgrade, these lessons were taught to everyone alive. The process of slowly manipulating genetics to a form that could steward the planet, AND feed their maker's purpose and will to maintain a life force, was used as THEE biomimicry platform that taught domestication and GMO practices that have endured to modern day standards. Our manipulation of genetic structures in plants, and then growing those structures of material to add to the sustenance stocks all began in Egypt. However, Egypt did not have the perfect climate for all life, so the ideals were spread, the process was taught, and the regions determined what crops would be most efficient.

In short, humans themselves were the first real domesticated crop on Earth. Trying to determine when and where that process of manipulating our DNA slowly, so that the extraterrestrial additions of DNA sequencing could function on Earth, began is fairly easy to discern. That process began when the dinosaurs became extinct. It was a very slow and determined process with many variations along the way that could not live up to the standards of The Hierarchy. These primitive hominids that evolved the genetic sequencing into a malleable form fit for creating the modern human, were not given the basic lessons of civilization. While there were attempts at domestication as I said before, the attempts were nothing like what modern agriculture is. That structure was taught as biomimicry from the process of creating humans... for the same reasons. They eat us, and we eat the crops. Same/same.

"What did the first humans eat?"

The purist form of originally created modern human ate a large variety of things. Their domesticated herds, fish, and several types of fruits and vegetables, to be specific. The land was plentiful in all ways, and the population was not as overwhelming as it is today. The goals were different so the motivation to produce abundance was nothing like now. A loss of an entire season of vegetable crops did not bother our earliest ancestors in any meaningful way. Adapting was easy because the modern complexities that fuel the desire to be individualistic did not even enter into the equation. That is the biggest hurdle to understanding the difference between us and them. The motivation that exists right now to genetically modify sustenance is based on a very large population that cannot feed itself without constantly implementing pesticides, and fertilizing with crude oil derivatives. The unmitigating population explosion is what gave the motivation to grow food in the modern way. The real Egyptian ancestors, had a much different motivation for learning what they learned. Their lessons were learned because they wanted variety, and to complexify their sustenance. We do it because we have to with so many uncontrollably breeding morons shitting their self replicas out without a care in the world other than continuing the self replica shitting out as often as possible. They did it because they wanted to. If humanity does not continue this assault on the biosphere, a very large portion of humanity must perish. This is the essence within the scenario of omnicide itself. After 1970/overshoot, it is imperative that the process be maintained. There is no other way to produce the sustenance for this size of a population. If we continue doing things this way, everyone will die along with the planet itself. If we self segregate into sustainable communities based on the land's ability to provide sustenance, a very large portion of humanity must die... but there will be survivors. That's the real question to everyone alive right now; How willing are we to put the species as a whole first, above our selfish aspirations? The clock is ticking, and as of December 21st 2019, we are keeping score.

"Do you have a recommended maximum number of humans on Earth? The Georgia Guidestones say 500 million."

That all depends on the paradigm, zeitgeist of the general populace, and genetic purity. The form of question, and the way in which you pose it has connections to a very derelict ideology that all are equal. At least that is what the question implies. It's as if you are asking blindly, how many random genetic structured forms of human can push this planet to absolute capacity. I've stressed several times now that equality is not possible, especially with the purity situation. I'll give you my version of this answer in the hopes that this idea will finally hit its mark. With the current hodge podge of several racial groups that are all interbreeding without any form of self control, or guidance towards a more refined version of the modern genetic structure fueling the breeding, 500,000,000 is a fairly accurate guess. Why? Just take a look at society and how uninformed the general populace is on what their actions are birthing. This is the conclusion of the equality ideals unmitigated. Omnicide... is the proper nomenclature. On a world full of black people, Asians, or Indians (dots not feathers), devoid of white people or Indios... about 0. The constant squabbling and lack of planning for the future will lead to starvation, regret, animosity, and eventual stagnation/atrophy, or all out war. Suicide, in other words. Not omnicide. Omnicide has to do with people waging war on their own environment, whether it be knowingly or unknowingly. Suicide will just humanity killing itself for personally charged reasons. On a planet like Earth full of nothing but white people, upwards of 10-20 billion. The infrastructure would span the entire globe, and together we would all fuel each other's progress, just like the "west" has done for the last several hundred years. The biomimicry platform would be identical to what humanity's maker is doing throughout this realm. There are many planets full of life that feed him sustenance. Earth could be a viable source of his nutrition, but as we can see just from recent events, selfishness and sexual desire are the real motivators for this current Earth population. Do you think it is a coincidence that is occurring at a time when white people make up less than 10% of the global population?

Colonization was what was supposed to give birth to the idea of a connected planet that could progress together. White people brought medicine, education, infrastructure, art, architecture, mobility, and domestication of food sources to the racial demographics of Earth... and what did they do with that knowledge? They bred themselves out of control, usurped our gifts and flaunted them as their own, then brutally attacked any truth that pointed to the actual mechanisms that evolved their societies. Now, after this process of demonizing everyone that brought the gift of civilization has reached peak propaganda standards, every racial demographic on Earth thinks they evolved into this complexity on their own. The hatred for those who tried to colonize/uplift societal function for primitive cultures, is the exact same scenario as humans en masse capitulating to the idea of evolution without creation. Our modern genetic structures were created. The societal complexities that all cultures of this world live by now, were given to white people by our maker. We didn't figure all of this out because we were "smarter." It was a gift. Most modern white people now do not even understand this, but those of us that do, give proper reverence for this amazing gift. Those that do not, I call niggers. Yes. There are many white niggers... Not only have white people been derelict in bestowing this reverence onto their maker, but the civilizations that white people have helped to uplift are also derelict to bestowing reverence onto their creator... wait for it... white people. Pride and ego seems to have won this internal battle, and now everyone is propagandized to assume ANYONE can do, what white people have actually done. That's impossible... and considering the trajectory of humanity's future, it appears that this lesson will be taught directly. The real problem is relinquishing selfishness, pride, and entitlement. If everyone alive were capable of doing this, my population assumptions would be very different. However, I am just going off of what actually exists, and how these societies got to where they are. There is no need to ponder what COULD happen, when we have so many examples of what has happened. It is not an insult to the self to be humble and accept that all humans are a subspecies of another being, it's actually Divine. BUT... given the indoctrination of the masses, it will be extremely difficult to end this ego driven insanity. And THAT... is the WW3 sequence that I've been referencing. Those are the battles taking place in the minds of everyone alive right now. The stakes are quite simply understood as, humble yourselves, or face annihilation/extinction. Welcome to the vanguard.

"Cuba" and "peak oil situation."

Cuba did not, and has not experienced any form of a "peak oil situation." The problem with Marion King Hubbert's research does not reside with him, but rather, in everyone that utilizes the nomenclature "peak oil" to signify an internal ideal of what those two words mean to the selfish individual using them. Cuba did have a sudden lack of participating in the global crude oil economic platform, but it did not go through a peak oil situation. Communism, pride, bravado, and selfishness is what caused the shift in Cuba's rejuvenation of Organic farming practices. Instead of swallowing their pride, admitting defeat, and joining the rest of humanity, they doubled down on their derelict ideology, and forced starvation onto their general populace as a result. The general populace fought back in the only way they could, which was to take care of themselves. Lawns became gardens, animals became the workers, and the people formed an equilibrium as a result. During this swap, the bravado and arrogance was allowed to be maintained by the upper echelon, and insider deals still formed. Cuba does have exports. Their economic interests extend beyond their populace's ability to be truly self segregated. This internal ideology is only possible with a fully integrated crude oil economy on a global scale existing outside of Cuba. An "end" to global crude oil reserves, or an extreme downturn, and Cuba would have lost a lot more than they did after the collapse of the USSR. Cuba's first problem in that scenario would be their ability to fight off intruders to their fish stocks that surround the island. If they lost the ability to control the waters around them, Cuba would be kaput. There may not be any beef on their menus, but I bet there's a shitload of fish options...

Let's start by giving you a quick rundown on what peak oil is. Many people try to utilize that nomenclature without understanding the data that created it in the first place. The word peak itself, refers to a precipice, not an "end." The only way to even attempt trying to understand what peak oil is, is by becoming an expert in EROEI. Energy Returned On Energy Invested, which is sometimes referred to as EROI. Same thing, just different wording. What Marion King Hubbert's version of that nomenclature was based on, was the declining Permian Basin's data, along with a burgeoning Ghawar reservoir's data, extrapolated to the remaining oil fields throughout the world. When Ghawar started to lose pressure, signifying the BEGINNING of its decline, along with the data from the Permian basin's reserves which have been declining for many decades, AND with the end of the Pennsylvania reserves in the rear view mirror, the trajectory was well established. EROEI wise, Hubbert's peak... was based on the precipice at which new reserves could be found and extracted at the same profit margin/EROEI, as the remaining oil preserves could maintain that were already being drawn from. The decline in every oil well's production over time varies in speed, but EVERY ONE OF THEM IS ALWAYS IN DECLINE. To give you an even more focused synopsis, ALL of this data is subjugated to the quality of the crude oil. The Permian Basin and Ghawar have/had the largest source of light sweet crude in the entire world. Light sweet crude is what birthed the middle class ideals of the 1940s and 1950s. What that nomenclature addresses is similar to how I described The Holy Grail's definition. It's referring to the high gasoline content which adds to viscosity (meaning easier to extract), sweet, meaning the low sulfur content (easier to refine), and crude refers to the substance itself in its crudest form.

There is a caveat to understand within this paradigm of a crude oil/finite energy reserve civilization. It's called Jevon's Paradox, as per Sid Smith. What it signifies is that the more we extract, the more we use. The more efficient we become, the more we use. The more people we birth, the more we use. Adding efficiency within this system does nothing to curtail the inevitable decline. If anything, efficiency within a crude oil economy tied to capitalism will increase overall usage dramatically. To the MK Ultra'd selfish disposition of the world's general populace currently; constant expansion without addressing these problems, is not a theory, it's a fact. As a result, Hubbert's version of peak oil has long since passed us by. The proof of that was when tar sands, shale reserves, and deep water reserves were tapped. Not only are those sources extremely heavy, and sour, but the material itself requires very sophisticated solutions that do not always pan out. There's even a movie about one of those deep water rigs exploding. Look at how much effort that took... JUST TO DRILL THE HOLE. Not the rig exploding and spilling gigatons of crude oil into the surface environment, but just to drill the hole. The Beverly Hillbillies found their oil reserve in the Permian basin with a shotgun, if memory serves. That's how easy it was to extract light sweet crude in our parent's parent's days. NOW... they're going through all of that trouble, just to refine heavy sour crude oil. The EROEI is backwards on shale and tar sands when the environmental toxicity cleanup is addressed, and the recycling of machinery away from those mining strategies. Even though that is a fact... it still seems economically feasible to the selfish and stupid, to maintain the societal infrastructure's whole. They're not exactly wrong, either. The crude oil economy (Lake of Fire) is everywhere on Earth. A complete swap over to Hydrogen (from this societal model of economics and fiat currency) would take an enormous amount of reclamation. Imagine how many gasoline/diesel stations would have to dig up their tanks and dispose of them properly. Then ALL car manufacturers would have to completely retool everything. And so on and so forth. Not only is that a difficult proposition, but then try to imagine every human on Earth HAVING TO learn a completely different system. How many selfish and stupid people would take the instructions for granted, expect hydrogen fill stations to be exactly like a gas station, and blow up the entire block as a result? I use this same analogy with morons that think personal nuclear reactors are a viable alternative. Imagine thousands of nuclear reactors in the basements of every resident in let's say... Flint Michigan. How long before Lake Michigan is inundated with radiation and the entire ecosystem therein collapses? But I digress...

The peak oil scenario from Hubbert's perspective is quite technical and applied to empirical data. What I am guessing is your view of peak oil, based on what you said about Cuba, is more of a philosophical ideology. What most people are referring to when that nomenclature is utilized, as you are trying to imply it, is the concerted effort, or forced by time result of an end to using crude oil. The reason why this is a philosophical approach is because the system that created crude oil can never stop, or we all die. That is the planet sequestering carbon to form its own equilibrium. Many forms of crude oil (before it becomes crude oil) are still going to be viable from a non burning perspective. How to pick and choose those variables in an already capitalistic mind frame is anyone's guess on how that will coalesce, however, meaning it's philosophical. Before that can even be contemplated, a viable alternative must be found. The problem in finding an alternative to crude oil is that NOTHING is as energy dense as crude oil is, especially light sweet crude. This conundrum implies that a drastic shift in efficiency must compensate. What I am saying is that no matter how efficient this system implemented gets, many people will have to die, or sterilize themselves as a result. You can only push the parameters of the Earth's trophic web so far, and without crude oil energy, or a viable alternative to match or exceed its capability (all while being carbon neutral and unlimited), people must sacrifice. Otherwise, omnicide will consume everything. Even the way in which you described Cuba could not occur during a real collapse. Cuba also had the ability to illegally raise money through drugs, and various other shady systems that were regulated outside of their country's influence, that they could leech from. Drugs, human trafficking, and all other forms of degeneracy are also fueled by the crude oil economy. There will be none of these alternative means of raising capital when the entire planet is reaching peak omnicide. My guess is THAT is what you, and so many others are trying to imply when using the term "peak oil," without understanding what Marion King Hubbert meant. There are legions of people that imply all kinds of stuff to that reference, and all of them mean something other than what peak oil actually means. The reason why I called that ideal peak omnicide is because once we burn the oil... it's gone. There is no recovery back to a functioning oil economy. At that point, humanity will be forced to fight each other for the dwindling resources left over, or drastically change EVERYTHING about their lives once and for all. To simplify: Omnicide, or Salvation...

What happened to Cuba was an embargo from the crude oil using nations. Let's say for argument's sake that the USA was met with the same scenario right now. We would be fine internally, but everyone else would be fucked. Ghawar would have to double production to meet the loss of our crude oil exports. BUT... let's just say that we didn't have the Permian Basin or ANWR's reserves, and had to suddenly go organic because we were embargoed by every other country. Inversely of Cuba, our weather does not permit year round farming in all zones, nor do dominantly sunnier regions have sustained water for that type of a swap. Therefore, resource migration ensues. Unfortunately, there's nowhere left to run to, and no more energy reserves on the horizon waiting to be discovered. War is the summation. If what I think you're trying to imply by using Cuba as a reference is accurate, there will be well fed, well cared for, and fully integrated platoons of Vegans to fight off the cattle farmers upstream that are stealing your crops and diverting your water during this forced migration... You see why that's funny, right?

Any referential sources of analogous systems to that which you are choosing to use as a viable alternative to a crude oil economy are fantasy. These sources of reference only exist because of the crude oil economy continuing to function outside of the reference. In your mind, you have to picture a system that is devoid of external influence entirely, to the point of not existing. Imagine Cuba being alone. I mean REALLY alone. No other countries could supply ANYTHING to them, and what's worse, they would have to protect themselves from all others trying to steal their shit. The actual result would be that a lot more people would have died, and the centralized power structure would be kaput. There may be some semblance of governmental system that would remain, but even the politicians would need to supply their own sustenance. Even having a "royalty" like system (as most politics are today), where the dignitaries do not produce anything in their worthless lives, implies that there is an external energy source with energy to spare. That would not be the case in a global collapse of the crude oil economy scenario... at any level. Communities won't be able to afford it. It's just basic math. Using Cuba as a reference to a solution for the present dilemma of omnicide is bad science. I'm sorry, but it is. The basic control of each scenario is astronomically different in scope and complexity. Before using nomenclatures like peak oil to certify notions of a global collapse of the trophic web, you might want to study up on what peak oil actually is. Plus, switching to Veganism to stifle the progress of omnicide is in no way, shape, or form a solution. It's virtue signaling... which is exactly why terms like "peak oil" are used by Vegans in the way they are... It's because these ideals are not properly understood, yet fought for emotionally. I'm not trying to demean you here. I'm trying to get you to understand the full scope of these subjects you are passionate about. Several of your referential points are inaccurate, and your entire view would change if these things were properly researched. Just to reiterate, if you want to choose to be Vegan, that's your choice to make. I have to advise you, however, that a Vegan is a liability to the survival of the whole during a global collapse. If the community you form is willing to accept the deteriorated genetic structure of a self prescribed Vegan's body into their resource base, that's on them... and you. Your withered ability, to that of an omnivore, especially during a collapse, will have to be accepted by you, as well. What your body could accomplish as an omnivore, and what that could provide to your community as a result, will need to be foregone for a personal, selfish, preference. You will be forcing others to take up slack for you. My goal is to create an optimum environment for all. Where ideals of a welfare state are gone to history. Veganism may not seem like a welfare system in today's crude oil economy with copious Satanic complexities (unnecessary implements), but the world of the immediate future tells a different tale. There's no reason to take any of this personally as though I am attacking something you stand for. I see Vegans trying to do the "right thing." What it actually looks like to me is religious. The notions are correct, but there are too many bad translations, bad science, and an almost complete lack of practical application to humanity's survival, and thriving thereafter. Veganism is a liability to accomplishing the goal of staving off omnicide... just like religion. It's my hope that you will see these aspects that have gone on unnoticed. Base intentions are everything. Until you can truly see things from everyone else's perspective, some of the more intricate and personal aspects are ignored. I'm just trying to help... even though this may seem like a berating session.

"Do you have recommendations on how to increase this ability?"

The only cure is to eliminate the stress. I cannot guarantee when it will happen, but I have given all the necessary tools to make a truly stress free life on Earth. Real purpose for everyone alive. A clear path to Salvation... but people seem to be content burning alive in the Lake of Fire. So... we all wait for them. When you reach a point of transcendence and are officially a type 1 civilization, relationship struggles are nothing like now. Sex is not a valuable commodity. Although everyone will be moving towards purity, and subsequently be beautiful as a result, sex will not be a selling point for women. At that point, society will dramatically shift. Feminism gave women the ability to make choices. All of them... even the women who shouldn't be allowed to choose. With that ability, the nuclear family dynamic has been obliterated, sexual promiscuity and STDs are common, porn is free and available to everyone with internet access, even young children, and why? The simple fact of the matter is that sex sells, AND!!! it's a fairly stress free environment. Some of those aspects are utilized by the general public, and the result is a much sexualized paradigm for all women to deal with. It becomes a competition to keep up with the herd. The cure to all of this stress is the nuclear family.

At a fundamental level, the nuclear family dynamic must remain intact. When women were given the right to vote, divorce rates skyrocketed, and the nuclear family suffered, thusly, everyone alive suffered... especially the women. When women estrange their children for personal conquest, a bond is severed that can never be mended. Internally to an emotional being/woman, this brings on devastation. That feeling of remorse and inadequacy gets filled with more sexual conquest, drugs, alcohol, possibly more kids, and then some more sex and alcohol, and the problem continues to grow in scope. All of this selfish shit needs to stop, then the stress will go away. Women stress these days because their men stress about the women fucking other guys. If the men didn't have a reason to stress over such notions, they wouldn't. My advice for a stress free life for a woman is to do everything you can possibly do, to ease the stress of your husband. You do that by being loyal, selfless, and productive. Men are going to be protecting everything in these communities of the future. Why would women try to make men resentful towards women if that's the case? If I was a woman, that is what I would do to secure my future during the collapse; say my marriage vows, and actually live by them. Men have a longer list of problems to deal with than women. If the goal is to create a stress free environment, there's your answer. In hell, women have been taught the exact opposite of what I just said, no? Empowerment, individualism, selfishness... all plights to break marriage vows/the nuclear family. Women cannot compete with men, and shouldn't even want to. That's like going to war with yourself. Men and women need each other, and that is the basis for the nuclear family. Severing that bond can therefore, only bring stress.

If humanity makes it beyond the collapse, well beyond the stresses of building an entire Earth covered in pyramids, sustained ecosystems, and purity, there will be no difference between the intellectual abilities of men and women. There are glimpses of this now in varying sectors of complex management scenarios, but those scenarios have an oil economy tied to them. Meaning ANYONE has the ability to choose to be selfish, or otherwise separate themselves from the whole, and their resource base will continue functioning and reinforcing the derelict notions of selfishness. That simply will not be the case in the near future, as I've been explaining. When these equilibrium scenarios are met, ALL stresses will slowly dissolve away. Women will be able to compete with men in all aspects of intellectual progress. Why? There won't be a reason to COMPETE at all. Men won't care who or what solved a problem, just that it was solved. And women won't brag about their ability to outsmart a man, because they will recognize that they wouldn't be in a place to solve that problem if it wasn't for men. Of course these types of ego battles will exist on some level for a very long time here, if humanity makes it, but they will slowly fade over time. Trying to leap ahead in this game of life can only hurt you. Stay in the moment and realize the steps to success that are necessary for that conclusion. This scenario might not even happen in your lifetime, but the goal is within reach whether you will get to see it or not. How will each woman choose to behave is entirely up to them. Women too have free will. Use it wisely.

The nine protrusions are fairly simple from what I understand of them. Birth/love/creation, 5 senses, intelligence/reason/logic, emotion/pain/feminism, time/degradation/death. They're not really an easy set of terms to identify with human language. Some of them are, like your "tools of the trade," your senses, but the others are difficult to fully comprehend from a human perspective. I try to stay with my protrusion. It's what I'm good at. Speaking for the other protrusions is not my place. I can explain my exact opposite on the protrusion scale, meaning Jesus, but that's really all I should comment on. Normally when I get these questions it's implied that there is some form of esoteric dogma containing chakras, sage smoke and mushrooms involved with elevating protrusions within the self. The situation is a lot more pragmatic and practical in application. There's also the questions that lead to Christ hopefuls and what they each stood for. I try to stay away from this kind of stuff because this information does not help humanity at all. The first Christ of this cataclysm cycle is pertinent, the last Christ hopeful is pertinent due to the feminist irony of present society, I am pertinent. Otherwise, there really isn't a reason to delve too deeply into them. They are numerous, but seven of them stand out. All of them had the same goals as Jesus and myself had, except they never woke up to the grand complexity of the entire system. History would have remembered these individuals from certain aspects of what we teach, but never the full load. In most cases, they were controversial to their era, and barely made it to safety alive long enough to fully integrate their lessons. The seven or so that I have seen, weren't even recognized as special. In several cases those hopefuls were coaching someone else in society, just like Maria was the hopeful, and Adolf was her student. History recognizes Adolf as the mastermind, though. The same problem would compound going back further in time. To be honest, it's a waste of time to even pursue the information.

"If women were created as a punishment, does that mean being one is a punishment? As in, every woman was in a previous lifetime a man who was some kind of failure?"

Definitely not. Being a woman is not necessarily a punishment, although I see why people think that. The idea of equality and a level playing field for everyone is an enticing idea. That is just not the case at this stage of development. Women, and every other subspecies to that of white men with blue eyes actually have a much easier path to Salvation. They do not have to accomplish the same goals. IF... they do everything necessary for us to accomplish our goals, they too are accomplishing their own. For example, a black woman choosing to sterilize herself, self segregate to her people's homeland Africa, teach everyone how sustainability, equilibrium, and purity are benefits, ALL for the betterment of her species, she would rocket past a white man with blue eyes that just became a cog in an already functioning system. She would gain the ability to go anywhere she wanted during her next life. Sterilization needs to be controlled and done for the right reasons. I am not even suggesting outright killing any subspecies, not even Jews. What the goal should be is to create an equilibrium point of sustainability, then maintain it. Every subspecies on Earth is living beyond their means. People can slowly come to an equilibrium by self sacrificing their ability to have children, or do like China did. 1 child per couple. But as we can see, that didn't really help anything. Each sub specie should have their own self segregated area that they form an equilibrium with. If THAT is the reasoning behind why people choose to sterilize themselves, that is selfless. If people choose to sterilize themselves so they can fuck everything with a pulse and add to the nuclear family deterioration conundrum, that is selfish. The intentions always come out during judgement. That said, choosing these paths for selfless reasons is Divine in every way. The further down the list you are when you make these decisions, the further you can "jump" when you transcend. It's easy for white men to not want to breed right now, because these choices are so difficult. It's up to a significant portion of humanity to CHOOSE to not breed, and instead encourage white men with blue eyes to breed. Arguably, an impossibility within hell, but nonetheless, that's the game. I have no doubt in my mind that I will be seeing many different subspecies members soar past white men with blue eyes during judgement. That's not the issue. The issue is... will ALL of them do it? It's not looking very likely. Just saying.

The placement of a soul doesn't necessarily signify what past indiscretions were pursued. Nor does being a woman signify that you fucked up in any way. Both are necessary to the whole, and both have obligations. To see why women were a punishment, you must view a scenario beyond the procreation standard model humanity lives by. The Yews are a perfect example. They did not breed. Their lives were simple, refined, and purely Divine. Just being a Yew meant you were essentially untouchable by any human. Far beyond our stature in every way. They did not even have to eat... There were no women for their species because there was no justification for procreation. The Yews could have lived indefinitely, if the humans didn't fuck up so badly. They were also gentle and unwilling to fight at all. They knew what was coming for them after death, should that ever arrive, and were content at every waking moment of their existence. Humans on the other hand have lived this way for so long, our punishments reflect our arrogance. We were scared of dying even though there is no reason to be frightened, and tried to assume control of all aspects of our destiny. So... humanity's maker gave humanity women so the perception of a continued progeny lineage after death could be assumed from a physical life perspective; procreation ensued. That was eons ago, however, and now the man woman dichotomy is seen as a teaching tool for understanding and subsequently balancing the principles inherent to every life in this realm. If/when humanity makes it, procreation will be seen as a blessing. It's really the only tool we've been given to right our wrongs. Right now, though, in hell, where purity is seen as a bad word and selfish carnal pleasures are viewed as empowering, women, and by default procreation itself... is indeed a punishment. It's a tool just like everything else... even you and I. It all comes down to how that tool is used. Use your tools wisely.

"On a similar train of thought, why did our maker create black people? Were they meant to be a certain way or perform a specific task?"

Black people, along with every other subspecies, were created to teach what civilized life looks like to a type 1 and beyond civilization. The creator of this realm likes a certain type of food prepared a certain way. His way. The original way. Imagine black people are watermelons, and Indios are beans. How can someone consume a watermelean? The two are separate for a reason to a human, correct? Does a bean flavored watermelon, or watermelon flavored refried beans sound appetizing? Now what if the crops you planted eons ago were designated to farm themselves/be given free will? Your supervisor instructed you that that was the only way to survive, so it had to be done. As an insurance policy, color was added, languages were issued, and every crop was separated by vast swaths of land. But one day the crops started to intermingle on their own, ignoring their own creators' designed segregation attempts. Given a long enough time period, all watermelons and beans would be integrated, and no pure watermelons or beans even existed. The beatermelons would take it a step further, and declare that they were not even created as a crop, or commit the ultimate betrayal of purpose in declaring they're the original crop that all other crops were based on... Confusion and idiocy would ensue at every level.

Black people were first created as labor, just like almost every other human. Specialized labor, but labor nonetheless. The original black genetic lineage loved their position in this system because they were good at it. All black people want to do now is take the reigns of every civilized society on Earth and call it their own, and they suck at leading. They're not made for it. Regardless, the idea of a diverse genetic populace is to teach you how to remain pure, while still integrating. Humanity figured out how to integrate, but they are severely lacking in purity morals. Imagine that on an interspecies level. Which atmosphere would they live in, what gravity parameters? Would they be in constant pain and suffering on either planet of their parent's origin? These are problems that should not be contemplated from the position of the creator's creation. If the creator wants that integration, he will provide it. The separation of subspecies in humanity on Earth was to make this lesson easy. Unfortunately everyone listened to the Jews, feminists, and emotional plights of selfishness and parasitic attachment, and as a result, failed this section of purity judgement. Emphatically.

"Must it be that way?"

There will always be designated strengths to each sex, and as a result the complexity of any given community will be based on those strengths. The crude oil economy allows complexity failure attempts while goals are pursued. No such thing will be allowed during the collapse. The energy to recover from such failures will not exist in any conventional way. When it comes to big production as was the case in the environment I got hurt in, some things yes and some things no. I made beer, wine, milk, etc bottles and jars at high capacity production. I don't think those systems will exist in any comparable way, although I don't see jar production going away. At some level, glass production will continue. Our older machines ran on purely mechanical drums similar to how a music box functions. The entire process could be electricity free, and glass is almost 100% recyclable. CAN women do it? Maybe. Should we waste time trying to push for them to be able to do it instead of just getting the job done as efficiently as possible? No. There are ways to scale down several different aspects of modern society so that everyone CAN do the tasks. The real question is, why? So... must it be that way? For now, yes. In the distant future it won't matter, like I said earlier... but this is not the distant future, so pursuing those kinds of goals can only inhibit progress in the present.

"How much have you restored your ability in that hand?"

About 66%, hahaha. Before I got injured, I worked out every day, was an avid bowler, and a machinist. It's difficult for me to be a machinist, but I try. The other two personal pursuits are impossible. I have tried, and it's extremely painful. Normal everyday shit has switched to my left hand for the most part now so that's a difficult question for me to answer in any meaningful way. Many ways of doing things earlier in life, I will never do again. There will always be a significant portion of me that is just simply unavailable. Again... this is a punishment... for humanity, not me. This derelict body on a Christ is what humanity earned when they tortured and murdered Jesus. You get what you give.

That was a long "1"... Sheeeeeeeit.

Brian

#21

#37 Overall

September 9 3:04AM

I made a lot of errors in that reply. Apologies. I'll start on the next reply tomorrow.

#22

#38 Overall

September 9 6:43PM

"Does your regenerative grazing method reduce the amount of land needed to raise cattle?"

No. What it does it make diversifying the land over several different animal species. Shane is going to implement chickens to clean up the grasshopper problems. Personally, I'd devise a catching system rigged to a simple vacuum and use the bugs for food in an aquaponics system, but that's his plan. For the stuff that the cows, then chickens, wouldn't eat, goats would clean up the material. Imagine the entire field is like a pizza where the three individually pinned species were ever moving around the circle, and all three were fertilizing the land as they cleaned it up of brush and insects. In the middle is the water system. Shane can accomplish this right now, but the time dedication is too intense. That is the main reason why I want to start farming water there. To have it on demand when the sun is plentiful. He's connected to a well system right now. An underground river system from what I understand of it. Not enough to water the land, but enough to keep the cows watered. He does use hay, but the ground he gets it from grows wild. It's not perfect by any means, but is sustainable and efficient as all hell. His land looks wild because it is. Most cattlemen just turn them loose on the entire property. Their land is eaten down to the point of it looking like a lawn. That's a problem for the various other creatures native to the area that handle other problems. . Shane has badgers, coyotes, rabbits, snakes, horny toads, road runners, fox, all kinds of birds (a few he built houses for), deer and all kinds of insects. It's healthy. The cow poop doesn't even make it three or four days above ground there. The dung beetles have returned in huge numbers. Even I was astonished at how fast they work. The entire property could be vacated of farming right now and be designated wild territory. That is true stewardship. Complementing the land as it is naturally, and extracting the "profits." That is when you are doing BETTER... than equilibrium. If/when I am able to start working on my windmills, I'll be able to install some sort of air pressure system, then his entire farm energy can be off grid, sustainable, plentiful, and with a bad motherfucker protecting it. I feel very sorry for the man that tries to fuck with Shane after the collapse. It will not turn out well. I forgot to mention his fencing system (electric) is run on a solar panel. 1 small one connected to a battery. The pumps are also run by it, so his water is already off grid, technically.

I'm totally down with gardening. I love vegetables and eat them as often as possible. Just because I am in favor of cattle rearing doesn't mean I'm opposed to gardening. It's my opinion that the land should be used to mitigate our footprint in it as much as possible. Vegetable gardening with soil is the opposite of that, so the crops for it need to be dense. Potatoes are a very good option. When it comes to salad green, cucumbers, tomatoes, etc, the footprint should be extremely compact and based in the aquaponic variety. That system produces the largest yields, is the least impactful on the environment, and gives motive to stop fishing the oceans to extinction. The gardens I would like to grow go upwards or downwards, not outwards. For the soils that I do have to use for the more needy varieties of vegetables, I'd use pots. My base would be red wiggler worm castings. I'm very familiar with them, and they make food delicious. All natural, even the food I feed the worms is organic and natural. They made my lemon cucumbers explode, and my tomatoes were amazing. The scraps just get pureed and fed back to the worms. I haven't tried fertilizing potatoes with it, but I'm sure it would help. I have grown potatoes on a few occasions, but the area was too wet. It was never a good crop. My eventual idea is to turn all of the waste from making cellulosic ethanol into the worm's feed stocks. then fertilizing cattle land with it for fruit trees and grass. I've already done all of this on a small scale. I want more bugs. More fish food. I want the land to have everything it needs to produce these things on its own. The ethanol making cattail littered holding pools will also help with the worm feed and fertilizer. The actual gardening system I am seeing is different than the normal version now. I would start with Shane's model, then add to it underground, and above ground. There aren't many people that think like that in the agriculture world, because it's sustainable on its own. There aren't really any profits other than free energies scattered throughout your own little carbon dioxide cycle loop. Well... that is until you find research time and build your hydrogen stuff. That's a ways into the future, though. So basically, it doesn't produce more cattle, but the cattle it produces are enormously more healthy for you, and the diversity is present. There's a dynamic that is not seen, and that is the biodiversity. They all complement each other, and all pieces of the carbon dioxide cycle loop are accounted for, sustainable, and therefore neutral... even the cows. It's a complete environmental scope that is rarely accounted for completely with "profits." Maybe that better answers the question at hand.

By the way, this is not "my" methods coming to fruition at all. Weldon Warren was the man that taught me a significant portion of this methodology, although he is at a much larger scale and sells a lot of product. Shane is in a different state than Weldon, but I got them to talk on the phone once, and their goals are different. Weldon is taking 100% grassfed beef to a whole other level. I may or may not have prayed for them to get what they wanted... but that's beside the point. He really is the walking talking version of the scientific method in action. Grassfed beef fat cleans the blood system. Grainfed beef fat clogs it. It's really that simple. HE... as in Weldon Warren himself, is the proof. You really should read his story. It's quite spectacular, and I'm glad I can call him a friend. Shane has been teaching me a much more personal and scaled down method, and THAT is really what I am interested in. A few hundred of these types of setup surrounding a neighborhood of pyramids. All the pyramids farming water and spreading outward into the land. Weldon will probably make a lot of money in the near future, but his security may be at risk. The personal sustainable farmer who is part of a community of farmers all capable of producing their own food and energy while being able to protect it is the way of the future... if the future is going to happen. I wouldn't want to fuck with Weldon either. These are men I am talking about. Hard working, extremely intelligent, and deadly accurate with a variety of weapons. I'm just saying his operation is large and hard to manage alone. Shane could do everything himself, but he has to keep working. Anyways, they are the experts, I'm below a novice level, heh. I just sound well informed because I read a lot. Although... I have been called a cowboy by a real Oklahoma cattleman and a rodeo bull rider, so... lol. I always brag about that in a talking shit about myself way to all these folks out here. Most of them are really fun people to be around. A couple of them I'd call family. Before this experience, my growing adventures were fairly small scale. I WAS about to build a very large aquaponic greenhouse on my Oregon property, and had made it pretty far into the project, then I became a Christ. I really had put in significant work on that project. I talked about it in chapter 7 of The Way. What's going on out here is very different from my methods. I'd like to do both, everywhere. Extracting ethanol is a big piece of my system. Bees play a large role in consumable sugars, and their flowers must be diverse and plentiful. That cellulose also feeds the ethanol extraction. I had the entire system ready, I just didn't know how to farm cattle properly until I met Weldon and Shane. Just wanted to say that for posterity.

"hunting and fishing. I notice that you've talked about aquaponics but not going fishing. Does this have to do with some of the current problems related to fish, such as toxicity (e.g. from plastic and mercury) and overfishing?"

In one of Sid Smith's talks he shows a picture titled "Earth's Land Mammals By Weight. It shows a basic overview of all life outside of the ocean... essentially. The distribution of sustenance for those mammals has decreased dramatically right alongside their population numbers. I would like to see those numbers balanced out with humanity's food animal share of the land. It's not an emotional stance, though it seems like it is. The real motivation behind wanting nature's animal population to rise is the genetic diversity within each species. There still is a significant amount of biodiversity, but within each species, the numbers have gotten so low that any disease or natural calamity has the ability to annihilate them from nature for good. That is the real fear. Once genetic diversity within a species is gone, the species itself is at risk. I am not against hunting or fishing, but there does need to be a moratorium on those activities outside of population control.

The idea that hunting wild game is a healthier source of animal protein is correct. The meat is leaner and has more benefits for the body when consumed. I cannot and would not argue that. What I am proposing as a solution has to do with the way cattle and other food animals are raised. The natural state of domesticated animals in a crude oil economy (grain fed) is the real culprit to maintaining grass fed animal food stocks. Capitalism and profit margins within it are the reason why grain fed beef even exists. It's a time allotment game, and the keepers of pricing standards control the ability for the farmers to diversify or make a total swap back to grain fed. The farmers are stuck in a loop where they have to produce calves for the grain fed establishment, just so they can survive. That said, grass fed beef is as good, if not better considering weight ratios, than wild game. The problem with it being profitable on the same margins as grain fed, is that it takes much longer to produce a fully grown grass fed cow than a grain fed one. Given the population situation globally, a complete swap to grass fed beef, and a resurgence in wild land for wild animals to repopulate, will not work in a financially controlled society. There simply is not enough time, as well as not enough beef itself that will be available to make such a swap. Humanity can not afford not to make this swap, but it also cannot afford to make the swap. Ultimately meaning population numbers in humans must go down, and during that period of time when we are choosing to cull our own numbers through passive means, people will need to drastically reduce their animal protein intake. The wildlife cannot sustain the onslaught that a world full of starving hunters will bring, so making hunting a viable defense strategy to this cattle conundrum will just be another level of omnicide coming to fruition. Humanity needs wildlife to sustain the wild. If we lose them for good, the entire biosphere will collapse. It's a touchy subject that needs to be debated within each mind alive right now.

Hunting is a great way to manage the wildlife populations, and it is a very healthy source of protein and fat. Considering the global impact that hunting has caused, there needs to be a break from it, though. 3-5 years should allow the populations to self regulate back into some semblance of sustainability. AT THE SAME TIME, a massive shift away from grain fed animal foods needs to also occur. The health system alone cannot handle an entire Earth full of clogged artery having humans. The feedback loops that impact every system outside of the animal food industries is enough motivation to make this swap, but as long as the food industry is tied to the crude oil economy, and that economy is based on capitalism, the seductive nature of profitability will win out more than not. This swap needs to be made by the populace that consumes these animals. When all animal food stocks are grass fed, the food will be as good, if not better than wild game. By my estimations, to make that swap would take about 3 years, which will require humanity to collectively change their entire eating structure. Keep in mind, I'm explaining the possibilities that could have been implemented starting last October. At this point in time, this kind of swap could be implemented, but there will have to be human sacrifice. There are simply too many humans alive right now to sustain this kind of a shift. The population numbers HAVE TO go down. There's no getting around that now. It's shitty news to have to give, but it's the truth no less. The solution is to raise our food animals the way that wildlife grows, which will offer a real alternative to hunting. Hunters are not wrong for doing what they've done, but at this point in time, knowing the numbers and understanding the impact that problem will bring to the entire planet, we have to take a break from it for now.

Fishing is a much more complex problem. Overfishing fucks up the atmosphere. Understanding the food chain of the oceans is essential to properly solving this equation. Without a fully functioning ocean biosphere, we will lose half of our oxygen... HALF. Keeping that system at full capacity should be the goal considering what will occur if we do not, but again... this is a profit game. The incentive to halt fishing does not exist for many countries around the world. Their culture was based on fish being food, and that is how they've sustained their populations to this point. The conglomerate fishing outfits that feed a production line system are the real problem, but humanity has is beyond fixing this problem with just shutting them down. The entire fishing industry needs to take a break and let the oceans form their own equilibrium. Again, this will take a significant human sacrifice, but if that sacrifice is not given, acidification will destroy the phytoplankton populations. And if that happens, the entire planet will perish. Most of these scenarios are identical in scope to that of the overall conundrum humanity is dealing with; annihilation, or Salvation. Those are the only real options humanity has left, and they spread into every aspect of life on Earth right now.

When it comes to lake and river fishing, the hatcheries do a very good job raising population numbers. Each individual region will have to decide their level of acceptable population within a given species, as long as their presence in the trophic web is sustainable. As far as ocean fishing is concerned, stop fishing them immediately before the feedback loops due to acidification kick into high gear. This is a severe problem that many do not understand. I lived on the Oregon coast before this all started, and used to walk my dog on the beach regularly. Once a year, a very large number of juvenile crabs would wash up on every beach dead. The cause was hypoxia. These types of events were happening, but on a much smaller scale. Now, they happen every year, sometimes several times. The oxygen in the water drops below life sustaining levels and the juvenile crabs simply suffocate to death. That is a direct result of acidification growing, and there's only "1" cure. While that cure is being implemented, humanity needs to let the oceans correct themselves. At this point, there will be mass die offs of numerous species. That is a foregone conclusion based on what we've already done. There's no way for us to manage every specie in the ocean, so the only way to know is to let the populations deal with the acidification process correction on their own, and pray they do not go extinct in the process. The die offs are bad... But fishing those populations during these die off events is suicidal. And this is just the beginning.

To compound on an already catastrophic scenario, the emulsification of plastics that humanity has dumped in the ocean over the last 100 years has caused significant biological problems in every aquatic lifeform on Earth. Plastics do not go away, they simply break down over time into smaller particles. During this gluttony of crude oil backed industrial expansion, the pulverized plastic particles have bio accumulated in everything in the ocean. Birds included (really, everything included that eats ocean fish). This small fibrous shards distribute evenly within the fish bodies, and as a result, plastics are consumed by anything that eats them, humans included. This is another dirty little secret that is often times protected from reaching the general populace's zeitgeist in any meaningful way. If you're eating fish from the ocean, you are also consuming a large quantity of plastic. That is a fact. What's worse is that it bio accumulates, meaning the saturation gets worse and worse over time. This is a problem that will last thousands of years, at the very least. The chemical derivatives that are released from a large quantity of plastics in the system is what's causing so many mental health problems in humanity right now. And it will only get worse from here. It's bad now... but this is only the beginning.

People will always want to eat fish. I get that, and understand the real mechanisms for why. That is why aquaponics are severely needed to reset the oceanic biosphere. If the fish stocks are raised and consumed outside of the oceanic paradigm, there is no reason to continue slaughtering the wild fish stocks. Again, this is a sacrifice that every human must decide to partake in of their own volition. I live this way now, by the way. I eat 1 meal a day, and usually it's balanced. If 2/3rds of the meals consumed by humans now were stopped immediately, the biosphere might recuperate. It's not a definite fix, but it is a step to rebuilding the wildlife on Earth. The food situation will not always be this way, but right now it is a necessary move. As I've said many times now, I wouldn't recommend anything that I would not also partake in. I'm partaking in this situation's solution now without anyone else capitulating. That's how serious I see these problems being. I can't speak for the majority of humanity, but if humanity wants to survive, this is the only viable path to that end. Just like the rest of the food and energy stores of the future, if you cannot produce it yourself, leave it alone. Fishing is no different. I'm not saying to stop eating fish, I'm saying humanity needs to stop fishing wild fish. To be honest, I have no idea how long that type of moratorium should last. The accumulation of carbon dioxide will continue to increase, and the deadzone phenomenon will follow suit. It could be a very long time before the oceans can be sustainably fished at the current capacity. The thing is, nobody really knows because of how vast and complex the ocean wildlife is. Anyone who contradicts what I just said is lobbying for profits. The health of the ocean and planet by proxy doesn't even enter their equation. There are problems we are creating now that won't be fully understood or felt by the populace for decades to come. The only motivation anyone should have concerning this matter is, if we lose the oceans, we lose the planet; omnicide, or Salvation. Keeps coming up doesn't it? Anyways, that's how I feel about hunting and fishing. I'm not emotionally attached to the stigmas of consuming wild animal protein. My concerns are based on practical application and sustainability. What we are doing now is as far away from those goals as anything...

The principles you guessed on are not a bad guess. Several of those qualities are coagulated into one section, but for the most part, I think you get the idea. The women's guesses are good. On a side note, the sand just arrived here! It's raining so we'll be delayed until that stops, but I'm locked and loaded. Exciting thinking about one of these devices making an appearance on Earth for the first time in 36,000 years, isn't it? It is to me. Anyways, I'll wrap this up by saying thank you again for everything you've done. I'm trying to not let you and everyone else that is participating down. The stakes couldn't be higher, and these delays are frustrating, but we'll get there. I have faith, LMAO!

Talk to you soon,
Brian

#23

#40 Overall

September 11 2:00AM

"What could be used to draw people away from it?"

This question is essentially what my entire mission is based on. Free will is at play, so it must be decided by each individual. How to do that? If you figure this out, please let me know. When this question is answered, I will be effective, but until we reach that point... we are stuck with the derelict decision making.

"Prior to your realization, did you believe we were created?"

At my base intention, personality wise, I had my inclinations going in either direction at several different junctures of my upbringing, but I never capitulated to my opinionated stance at the time. Let's say creationism is white, and the opposite of creationism is black, for argument's sake. Before my realization I was constantly in a state of gray. Within the structure of my thought processes, making a definitive stance and acting upon that stance was impossible to me because I could not definitively prove to myself one way or another that the black or white spectrum was conclusive. Before any opinionated clause could be implemented into my own thought process, I had to prove things to myself. I'm pragmatic and practical in just about everything I do now, and have ever done for that matter. To make a long story short, creationism was a waste of time to me. It served no purpose to fixing the dilemma I saddled myself with at such an early age. As a result, my arguments towards people that did make a definitive decision on this subject was harsh and direct. Both sides of the argument would usually be identical in scope. I wasn't trying to prove or disprove their opinions, but rather, I was trying to get them to see that the shit they were spouting was an opinion. This methodology took several turns over the years, and as a result, people just assumed I was arguing for arguments sake, but that was also inaccurate... as most people are about everything if they're willing to accept opinion as fact.

This same ideal is still happening, and a few times now, you have been in the crosshairs. It seems as though you've done a magnificent job at understanding this, as your most recent reply illustrates. Doing accurate research is very difficult in hell, especially with so many sources of distraction pulling your attention in different directions. When your attention is pulled in one of these varying directions, the first thing you must research internally, is why. Why does anyone want you to pay attention to what they are saying? That should be the first thing you investigate for ANYONE making a claim, myself included. The motive to grab your attention is what is important during an investigation, not the information being given. Before that motive is established within the source of information you are seeking, you will be subject to their ego, your ego, and the general populace's zeitgeist for whatever era you are researching. When those stipulations eclipse the motive within the intentions of the subject at hand, everything you research becomes subject to those parameters. Take Veganism as an example. It's clear to me that you have dedicated a significant amount of time to this subject. If I'm guessing correctly, you are a Vegan now, or were well on your way to becoming one before we started this interaction. As a result, I must now instruct you based on every opinionated stance anyone who has ever taught you anything about Veganism had. Meaning, I have to tear down a significant portion of this structured methodology that was built up within your teacher's ego... and your own. Therefore, my arguments do not center in on the subject of Veganism at all, but rather, my methodology is centered in on why you allowed yourself to be manipulated to such an extent... when the entire argument was always just an opinion. That is why I likened this material to that of modern religious philosophy. There is no all encompassing stance to Veganism, just like religion, meaning neither are solutions to any practical problems... they are emotionally charged opinions.

The real shitty part about discussions of this nature is that I see what you were trying to do. I understand that you gauged a situation, recognized a problem inherent to a system of control, and tried to implement a real strategy for rectifying a significant problem. Your desire was righteous. I am in no way arguing that. What came as a result, however, was not. There is no real way for me to explain this to you without my words being taken as offensive. Therefore, I have to bombard your conscience with real facts, then allow you to make a decision on your own. Sometimes I do stray into the offensive, and sometimes my words are only perceived as such, but the real kicker here is that whatever arguments you may have towards my arguments, are unfounded in reality outside of what you've decided to accept as righteous to your cause. Notice how I said that? YOUR cause. When debating certain topics with me, you have to always keep in mind that NONE of this is coming directly from ME. As in, what you consider you, and how you would mentally project that association to self onto me. Everything I do, I do for my maker... and my maker is not necessarily YOUR maker, meaning that our motives do vary. While I am willing to accept any number of degenerative motives so that humanity can survive the inevitable collapse, there are several subjects that you don't seem to be able to budge on. It's those seemingly miniscule semantics notions that make us vary in scope and breadth.

"I" of the most poignant events of my realization period was having to come to terms with these types of things on my own. I had to admit not only to myself, but the entire hierarchy of this universe, that I am just a stupid human. NOTHING I have ever done... was the result of my dedication, my strategy, nor my ability. Everything I have ever experienced was a gift from someone else. Therefore, there is no reason for an ego to even exist. It was at that point where the information became less constricted while flowing to me. I hadn't realized until that point that it was ME causing this to happen. Nobody else was responsible for my decision making. I was fucking up all on my own. While most people reach to the sky and spite the members of The Hierarchy for not having the necessary means to solve personal problems, their real problem is in who they are directing that energy to. It should be directed inward... not outward. When I figured this out, my first action was to apologize for making things difficult on my maker in the first place. He was just trying to help, and I took the strategy of MY goals are important, as opposed to just letting my superiors do what they needed to do to fix "me." That was the moment I experienced true ego death. The first step was admitting that I was wrong about so many things. However, I did not experience true ego death until I could unravel WHY I had put myself in the position to be wrong in the first place. And that... is why so many people have a difficult time maintaining a righteous AND Divine path. It's one thing to admit you were wrong, but it's a very in depth introspection to decode why you chose to be wrong. I hope that makes sense...

The other side of the coin to admitting these aspects of my own inadequacies was recognizing that not only was I being a fucking idiot, but everyone alive was under the same spell I was. That was when I learned about forgiveness. Earlier in life, I was an absolute asshole to everyone that crossed my righteous inclinations. I often became very angry while simultaneously confused. In hindsight, the confusion was the answer... not the anger. My confusion was present because I didn't know myself, therefore, how could I pretend to know anyone else. Within this directive, I learned to forgive everyone of their misconceptions and wrongdoings... for they know not what they do... and what's worse, they don't know what caused it nor how to fix it. In regards to you, Nathan, Shane and a few others, I hold you guys to a higher standard. I approach these difficult to handle scenarios from what appears to be anger. I'm not angry at you when these things come up, but rather, I'm pressed for time right now and it makes me nervous that I am inadequate. While in prior timeline scales I would calmly and rationally take all of you through these kinds of arguments in a more friendly way, I don't have that kind of time any longer. I do apologize for the way in which this must be done now, and how that might be received by you as a result, but the way I do things is always in your best interest, even if you cannot see why in the moment. That's really where my intention differs from anyone else alive, and also... why it is so frustratingly difficult for anyone to see me for who I am, and what my actual intentions are. The task of trying to determine my motives based on anyone else's motives that are responsible for teaching you everything you've learned in life, is almost impossible. Anything I try to teach, and anyone I try to teach it to, must first go through everyone's internal "ego filter" before I can even make an impact. While for the last year and a half, I was patient and compassionate about every individual plight therein... now, we simply do not have enough time. Something could change, however, and that time could be extended, but I have to play this game based on what I see... as opposed to how I feel, and all signs are pointing towards my end coming sooner rather than later.

Another portion of this recent reply eluded to worrying about the perception you give off to others. With me, I simply don't give a fuck what people "think" about me. I don't mind being a punching bag here. What people think about me doesn't matter as much as what those people's actions produce. The dichotomy of men and women is no different from your perspective. The only way for a woman OR man to win TOGETHER... is to continuously try to best each other, while also allowing an unmitigated flow of information between the two. You might be responsible for 90% of any given workload, but can only be successful at your endeavors if 100% is accounted for. If the remaining 10% could only come from a man, the full 100% of your own 90% must be shared with him without reservation, lest he would not be able to complete the task. Whether you did 90% of the work, or he did, and either had to account for the remainder, the two "halves" are required for both genders to "win." Bragging about how much effort you personally put into a subject is irrelevant. The simple fact remains that without help, the entirety of the goal will be lost. One must first ask themselves a simple question; am I trying to gain glory, or will everyone gain glory from my sacrifice? Again, this comes down to selfishness, or selflessness... as do most things in hell. Take me as an example. I do not hold back anything from you because of your gender. You might be the only human alive that can bring a win on. Your gender has nothing to do with my motivation for speaking to you... My only goal is a win... for BOTH OF US. I will do anything and everything I can to make that win happen. Until that ideology is ubiquitous in all human endeavors, there will always be a loser. And in a time of survival being the primary objective, a loss is a loss that both genders must carry. When "I" loses, everyone does. In short... fuck what other people think while on a righteous path. Man, woman, tranny, child... doesn't matter. NONE OF THEM are your maker. HE is the one you're trying to capitulate to. Not some self centered idiot that bases their abilities on what dangles between their legs. It's a very difficult task to recognize me in hell. You did that, and have done very well since. While this might seem like an opportunity to brag or feel superior to the men in this society that have not been able to accomplish this mission, take this opportunity to shelf your ego. TRY... to help them reach your same stature. You never know who will be the next one to elevate BOTH of you beyond this precipice. In so doing, you'll both win. Otherwise it was all just wasted potential...

Marion King Hubbert's ideology; peak oil, was based on the ability to find new reserves, not oil production capability. It was about the ability to find new oil reserves, and how easily it would be to extract said oil. Oil production capability is what peak oil is confused with. There's no way to properly determine how much oil is in each reserve, the quality of said oil, or how much energy implemented it will take to recover it. Although everyone that uses the term peak oil THINKS that the production capacity is THEE aspect to determining what peak oil refers to without properly researching it, that is simply not the case. Peak oil, from Hubbert's perspective, was the timeframe in which humanity would reach a point where the ability to find recoverable reserves diminished significantly. One does not need to interject false equivalents into that algorithm. With the land masses of Earth being well researched geologically, finding new light sweet crude reservoirs that are easily accessible is close to impossible after such a long dedicated focus on that mission. That tells us that the only recoverable reserves of any value, inherently have a diminished value just due to their location alone. In other words, there could be enormous amounts of light sweet crude reservoirs at the bottom of the Pacific ocean, but extracting that oil will bring an immediate downturn in EROEI, simply due to the engineering difficulties, and proximity to refinement facilities. THAT... is the basis for Hubbert's view of peak oil. It's not about how much oil is in the Earth, but more so how accessible it is, when compared to the discoveries of his era of research. When Hubbert did his research, Pennsylvania was dried up, the Permian Basin was dropping in production, and Ghawar was just coming on line. All 3 of those examples were on land, and the proximity to the refinement facilities AND where the product would be consumed were fairly close.

The first bumps in that road were felt when the USA had to import Ghawar crude oil. The oil itself immediately became worth less, just because of the voyage it had to take to get to the consumer base. Ever since that first bump in the road was felt, Hubbert's peak oil equation could be seen as empirical. All of that said... IF!!! another reserve of light sweet crude would have been discovered after the initial estimations were made on timing peak oil's arrival, the estimation would have been inaccurate, but that does not mean the entirety of the research would be inaccurate. It would simply mean that peak oil would be further into the future. ANWR kind of did that, but when the scope of how large Ghawar and the Permian Basin's reserves are were entered into the equation, ANWR is a drop in the bucket. Same with everything in reality. Yes... many more reserves can and have been found... But none of them... NONE OF THEM... are even close to the size and quality of what Ghawar and the Permian Basin produce. The EROEI is backwards on just about every other reserve found since Ghawar came online. There's lots of oil... but when it takes more energy to recover it and refine it for usage in the society Permian and Ghawar built... the equation will never balance itself. There will always be a negative summation to that of the effort inherent in recovery. I know how difficult it is to understand all of these complexities because I've studied them extensively. I do an okay job of getting my point across, but that's why I always recommend studying the source of this knowledge. EVERYONE alive has an opinion on "peak oil," and almost ALL OF THEM are wrong. Most of those sources of knowledge bleed into many different subjects with many different instructors teaching things based on incorrect assumptions. I've dealt with this problem for 25+ years now. I see some of those false dichotomies in some of the things you profess, which is why I recommend studying the source for yourself. I have no idea how often those ideals have infected otherwise seemingly righteous ideals people have taught you, that you hold sacred. You're the only one who could know that. Unraveling the incorrect teachings you've received on that subject matter can only be done in a certain way. Study the source. FUCK THE OPINIONS! THEN... and only then... will you be able to determine who is full of shit on the subject, and why they're trying to get you to capitulate to their motives. Until then, everything becomes a shit slinging contest of opinionated garbage flying in everyone's direction, which is why it is so easy to incorrectly extrapolate summaries. The feeling becomes based on who agrees with YOUR opinion... not the actual truth itself.

"Will "atheists" be able to find all that they need to achieve equilibrium, or are they doomed to fail without deliberately connecting to their maker?"

Atheists are an interesting group. They are no less religious than any other religions on Earth right now. That said, their "God" is the Earth itself, which they are not wrong in assuming. They base this notion on reason and logic, but the overall scope is lost. Even pushing the idea that random inception is the cause of all existence within the universe's boundaries contradicts the reasoning in their synopsis. A system as complex and grandiose as this universe is, must have reason and logic for existing in the first place, lest it would be an unconscionable waste of energy. So... on a small scale their intuitions are accurate, but extrapolated outwards, they fall demonstrably short. Achieving full equilibrium under such circumstances is impossible, however, given the current situation on Earth, atheists have the most promise. That may sound contradictory to what I stand for, but as I said earlier, this is a game based on survival. Atheists, for all their derelictions and flaws, still view the Earth as an integral portion of their existence. In so doing, they are serving their maker indirectly. I cannot say the same thing for most religious personalities. Most of them view the Earth as a toy to be played with devoid of personal sacrifice. In their eyes, Earth itself is separate from them, and that is a very costly mistake to make to themselves, AND their maker. At least the atheists see the Earth as a part of them. So... CAN they reach equilibrium? Yes. Will they? I don't know. Both sides of the religious dogma shitcoin have their problems, and it's difficult to assume ANYONE can see the light of truth. I pray for both equally regardless. It's my hope that EVERYONE will transcend, but there's no accurate way for me to tell you definitively which side is closer to achieving that end.

Great questions, and I hope that the stern nature of the way I teach won't scare you away. Remember... I said that you should expect 100% transparency, even if you don't like it. I'm not in this to make friends, although I am not opposed to the possibility. I do consider us friends... which is exactly why I will not hold back anything from you. A real friend is honest at every event in a friendship, and that is the only thing I can really offer you: honesty. I hope this helps.

Thank you for everything young lady (<-- I mean that). You've graduated the ranks of "girl" and "woman." You're "I" of us now. Being a gentleman or a lady is an honor. You've earned it. Keep up the good work,
Brian

#24

#42 Overall

September 12 2020 12:20AM

"So "peak oil" is actually "the peak of oil's EROEI"?"

No. Peak oil, according to Marion King Hubbert, the man who defined that terminology, peak oil is referencing the height at which our discoveries of new reserves "peak." It's not going to happen, BUT... Ghawar and the Permian basin could sustain their light sweet crude quality well into the future. In so doing, they would stay level on the EROEI scale. This is just a hypothetical example, just to reiterate. The data suggests that the more gets drawn from those reserves over time, the lower in quality the oil becomes. Plus, the pressure within the reserve drops signaling that the reserve is diminishing at a steady decline. The idea here is that as the crude oil economy continues moving forward, we must find a steady supply of newly discovered reserves, or the entire system will begin to decline steadily until there is no more oil left. The more reserves we can find, the longer we stave off that event occurring. As I've said, the only "new" reserves we have found on Earth over the last 50ish years are tar sands, shale, and bitumen. Those types of discoveries cannot even enter into the equation due to their extremely poor quality. The EROEI of those reserves is backwards, meaning in order to extract the gasoline and diesel from that particular oil, we would need to put more energy into refinement of it then we will be able to use from it. The fact that we have not found any other Permian or Ghawar type oil, AND the fact that we have started refining heavy sour crude as a stopgap to the economy collapsing, means that "peak oil"... as Marion King Hubbert described... happened years ago. If that event hadn't already occurred, then why are we even considering refining that junk oil? The reason... is because we cannot find any more quality oil reserves, which is the exact reason why "peak oil" as a nomenclature exists. Get it now? The quality COULD (but more than likely won't) remain at a light sweet crude quality. The reserves that we have tapped already COULD (but more than likely won't) last for a long time at the current pace. The data suggests that neither one of those two scenarios is anything more than a "pipe dream." But that is also why using the term "peak oil" to define those types of events is simply bad science. Those conclusions are NOT based on empirical data, meaning they are philosophical in nature. The declining ability to FIND NEW RESERVES, however, IS based on empirical data because there are only so many places we can explore on the planet. Most places have already been explored, meaning those areas have already been accounted for. As the map of areas to explore gets smaller and smaller, peak oil becomes not only likely, but certain. With this knowledge in hand, it's easy to see that we are beyond the peak, of peak oil.

"If there is no ego then what is it that has free will?"

The conglomerate. The entirety of a species. The ability for an entire planet full of intelligent beings to move in "1" direction together... as "1"...

Being a whole as a species is where humanity started. While there were indeed selfs, the goal of the species as a whole was what directed action. Now that humanity is in hell, you are as far away from that Divine aspect of existence that you have ever been. Currently, there is nothing other than selfs. Instead of "1" ego controlling the entirety of humanity, there are now 8 billion-ish individual egos trying to control everyone else's narrative. Spiritually speaking, doing this is pure anarchy. And as we can tell from the recent events, it's only a matter of time until that anarchy bleeds into the physical. It might have already passed the ability to rectify the anarchy at hand, but we will not know that outcome until I hand in my report/die. Until THAT happens, I will continue trying to unite humanity under "1" purpose. It's quite literally the only way to survive.

"Obviously there is no much profit for you and the claims you make."

It depends how you view the definition; profit. There is no HUMAN WAY to quantify "my" profits. On Earth, you are correct. There is no physical substance or material that can add to my profitability. However, outside of Earth's influence, I seek the greatest "profit" of all: creation. My goal is to elevate the ability for Earth to create new creations. In so doing, my "profits" will be too numerous to count. Humanity's maker will expand and grow outward in all directions... adding to "my" ability to produce new makers. New makers add new and hopefully improved versions of creation itself into the universe's simulation sequence. THAT, my fine young friend, will bring God, the man himself who exists outside of this universe that much closer to transcending, meaning I too will be that much closer to transcending. PROFIT... for everyone involved, including humanity itself. These are things that humans cannot see right now, but these profits do exist, and... are the entire reason for the universe's system to function in this way. If we lose humanity, my profits go down. If humanity survives the pending collapse, my profits will rise. In reality this break between dimensional boundaries (3rd and 4th) and what I am doing here is strictly to provide more direct profits for humanity's maker. I will receive them much further down the line as time moves forward, so technically I don't receive anything directly from Earth in the form of profits. I receive them when humanity's maker, and by extension humanity itself, give reason to expand the overall scope of the universe itself. When it grows... we all profit from it.

"making the best LARP ever."

I hope that by now you have no doubt in your mind that I'm not joking or LARPing at all. But it is funny to consider I'm going to all of this trouble just to get people to think I'm someone that I'm not. That's why I ask where the motive is to people that claim that about me. If any of them knew what I gave up to do what I'm doing, the entire idea of me LARPing about this has no logic or reason to it at all. But it is funny watching people on 4chan and places like that try to paint me with that brush. I understand why people feel that way better than they know themselves. There have been so many LARPer throughout history claiming to be me and falling short of expectations, that the skepticism has run amok. Zero trust. It's their loss ultimately, which is why it doesn't bother me. All I have to say to them is... good luck. They're going to need it.

"What does this mean?"

As I've experienced on this journey on many occasions, religious zealots stick to a code that they feel is a ticket to direct transcendence, first class. Humanity's maker never gave a directive for people to be arrogant about their abilities, however. Christians seem to have forgotten this stipulation to existence, and as such, feel as though their religion should be practiced by everyone in humanity. In a zealot's mind, this is the ONLY way to achieve humanwide transcendence. As I have hopefully proven at this point, not only is Christianity wrong for assuming such a position, but they've taken that arrogance so far, they are hurting themselves in the process. That is not to say that a large amount of Christian doctrine isn't useful, far from it. There are many aspects of Christianity that can and do provide a path to enlightenment on some level... But when it comes to those aspects being the end all be all to enlightenment, they fall demonstrably short. So... there are many great lessons to be taken from the Christian philosophy of life, but those philosophies are not "all encompassing." Same with Veganism. There are many great lessons to be learned from a Vegan perspective on farming, health, etc, but those aspects are in no way an "all encompassing" methodology for the entirety of humanity to live by in order to survive the pending collapse. Maybe after that event simmers down humanity can start to ubiquitously apply those lessons to all human life. Probably not, but the possibility does exist in the future where everyone alive can be a Vegan, and no shortcomings will be felt. As it stands right now, and the foreseeable future, being a Vegan is a hindrance to the unified structure of the communities that will survive the collapse. That's why it's a touchy subject to approach. It is a good strategy for a healthy humanity... in the distant future, but not right now. I'm not saying Veganism is wrong. I'm saying that Veganism is not a viable defense for what is coming. In fact I am saying the opposite. RIGHT NOW... being a Vegan with what is on the horizon is a liability to THE WHOLE.

"Maybe because it occurs at a fairly subtle level?"

The mirror effect is interesting from my perspective. Knowing that it exists makes it a lot easier to forgive. This is where absolute meekness is actually a virtue. Yes. You are correct that on a subtle level, the mirror effect is always in play. On a world full of competing egos, it's difficult to assemble a strategy outside of that paradigm. I realize this when I talk to everyone I interact with. There's no reason for me to be upset about it, because everyone alive is infected by this "virus." There are quite a few of you that at least recognize that there is something wrong. You, and all of my friends. Which in turn makes it a lot easier for me to teach you how to cure this "disease." The real problem is in everyone who doesn't even think they're sick to begin with. On that level, there is no subtlety to the mirror effect at all. With complete inundation on whomever I am interacting with's perspective, I react towards them in a slightly varied attempt to get them to see in themselves what they despise. You've seen this many times on 4chan. The easiest way to spot it is when a snap judgement is made. You don't do that. You do make judgements, but they are well researched. It allows for much more pleasant interaction, wouldn't you say? So yeah... the mirror effect will continue. People might even be doing this to you now. Nathan goes through it regularly. Just keep in mind that they're just talking to themselves... then it becomes funny, as opposed to insulting.

"Aren't the different makers at least of the same species and have the same basic desire, which is to be fed by us?"

There are makers for all species and subspecies. Their desires are based on varying criteria, though. The abstract way of viewing this system is that it is all flowing in the same direction; upward. In the most basic and extremely oversimplified way of viewing this system, you're correct. However, as all subspecies belong to various different makers, the interbreeding of the different maker's subspecies is strictly prohibited. Lest, the makers of those varying subspecies would lose their source of sustenance.

I'm guessing that when you refer to "same species" you're referring to genetic lineage. Within The Hierarchy of this universe which stretches all the way to The Nine Principles, in humanity's case, we are all in the same genetic lineage, but NONE of us are the same species. The 3rd dimension, in which you reside currently, has billions upon billions of varying degrees of transcendence, and physical stature. Within the ranks of the type 1 civilizations currently, there are many billions of forms of "man." Some of them look (on the outside) exactly like a human from Earth. For all intents and purposes, you could be standing right next to one of these species, and you wouldn't be able to tell that they are any different from you. However, every species has a specific anatomy that was developed on their own planet/space ship. Some of these seemingly identical species have significant variances in organ size and placement due to the variances of their home planet's upbringing of their genetic structure. Some species have 1 lung, and a massive heart. Some have 4 stomachs, similar to a cow on Earth. Some have obvious differences like massive ears, or more than two eyes. Regardless, every species is grown into their current stature based on their specific planet of origin. This is the reason for evolution existing before creation/upgrading. The species must have a tried and true method of survival before intelligence is given. That's the way the system works for everything in existence. The genetic structures are grown in a particular environment, then upgrades are given at a specific time. Humanity calls this event the dawn of civilization.

As each species drudges their way through type 0 stature (depending on how often they've fucked up), certain lessons are applied to help teach this process of how the varying species are created. Humanity on Earth has fucked up a lot. More than most. Humanity's inability to understand these concepts led to the tower of Babylon methodology, where the idea of protecting a specific genetic lineage WITHIN a species had to be implemented in order to be understood. Same difference when/if humanity were to enter into The Hierarchy as a type 1 civilization. You're not supposed to breed outside of your genetic lineage on Earth, for the same reason why you shouldn't breed between varying species of different planetary origin. On a fundamental level, breeding with a species from a different solar system that has 1 lung and a huge heart due to their atmosphere varying from that of Earth's dramatically, would cause a significant problem for the progeny of that interaction. Who the hell knows what would happen, but the fact remains that the species would not be a viable genetic match to EITHER environment of their parents origin. On a spiritual level, the muddled genetic progeny would have no real connection to The Hierarchy they were born into, thusly being forced to go at existence alone, which leads to extreme angst, confusion, and ultimately retribution just for being born. You can imagine how shitty that must feel, right? No home, no maker, and no real way to connect spiritually (ethereally) to ANYTHING. All because of a sexually charged fetish within the parents.

What is happening in humanity right now is this exact dereliction on a global scale. While it may appear to be harmless on a physical level, the spiritual side of the coin is discombobulated and defunct of all connection, which is what has brought on the extreme draw towards sex as the only way to "feel good." In reality that is accurate. For a mutt, especially Jews, the only way they can feel good/complete, is to engage in carnal acts of desire. They don't know anything else, because to them... there is nothing else. Thankfully, humanity's maker decided to teach these ideals at a type 0 perspective through the separation of the subspecies on Earth, as to not inundate the local "flora and fauna" of the universe to humanity's carnal obsessions. Unfortunately, this lesson has not been learned. In fact, this lesson is fought against vehemently by almost every society on Earth. They would understand why these acts are so detrimental biologically and spiritually if they could connect to their maker... but, as we've seen numerous times now, selfishness and ownership ideals are everywhere. Meaning, they physically halt themselves from the connection to their maker. The disease has spread. The nomenclatures are exactly backwards. Thus... more aspects of hell emerge. Racial inbreeding is hatred, to your maker. Destroying purity is hatred, to your maker. Assuming ownership of the self is hatred, to your maker. When a subspecies interacts with a different subspecies of this universe in a carnal way...

that is hatred... TO BOTH MAKERS. So yes, the goals are basically the same, but the nuances are what matter. Always remember, EVERYTHING is a microcosm, macrocosm, and/or euphemism for an already existing system/structure. Humanity's maker has been creating "men" for a very long time. Everything being done on Earth by humans has been seen before many times over. What myself, and everyone in The Hierarchy are trying to do, is get humanity to a point where you can create a system/structure that we haven't seen before. The only way to accomplish that mission, is to have humanity go through the process of learning everything we already know. The shitty part is, humanity can't even get past these easy lessons... but I'll keep trying to rectify this defunct, completely backwards, and utterly destructive way of life until my last breath is breathed. You have my word on that.

This would be a better conversation done on the phone or in person. It's better when these intricate subjects are broached from the perspective of being able to ask questions within the conversation. I hope it wasn't too confusing. Great question to ask, though. It's one of the more touchy subjects, which usually leads to anger, but it doesn't have to be that way. It's just easier to hear these things instead of read them. Probably has to do with attention spans within the hell paradigm. There's just so many people arguing in favor of impurity, that taking these lessons at face value is a difficult task to say the least. From my experience, it's just better trying to understand what I'm saying if you have the ability to interact within the conversation. I just hope I didn't confuse you. Let me know if I did. This might be the most important thing humanity needs to rectify, and everyone alive is emotional about it due to such ego saturation. In reality, it's a very easy concept to understand and capitulate to... as long as you're viewing it from a galactic, or universal perspective. Viewing these things from a dumbed down "Earth only" view is why everyone has the problems they have. It's all about scope. Very difficult to get across properly just from "1" email. Still, great question. Extremely pertinent.

"It's so common to try to get off emotionally and feed one's own ego, and I get repulsed when I see that."

Welcome to an enlightened path in hell. All I can say is, prepare yourself. It will get worse. In so doing... you know what you are doing is righteous. Like I've asked all of my friends at varying stages of this process... Is this what you thought enlightenment would be? LOOOOOOL All you can do is try to remain humorous about it so you continue to feed your maker. Free will is the best gift we could have ever asked for... But in a place like this, it will seem like a punishment. Don't let the demons get to you. They are living for the moment. You are now living for eternity. Your scope will start to reflect that, and the demons will amass trying to leech from your energy parasitically. The only way they can achieve that is if you allow yourself to play THEIR game. You're better than them, and they know it. Use that as fuel to shield yourself from them. Build impenetrable defenses. It's as easy as laughing at them. Really. You're doing great, by the way. Keep up the good work.

Talk to you soon,
Brian

#25

#44 Overall

September 13 2020 1:27PM

"People are clearly not aware of this situation."

Exactly... but now you are. As you can see from the depth of misunderstanding, the term "peak oil" has been used as a scapegoat to those who make snap judgements just based on the terminology itself. Take this information and use it to dissect everyone that makes claims that they understand the conundrum at hand. You'll be astounded at how many people have fucked that up. It's very similar to how people behave in regards to religious doctrine. They hear whatever they want to hear, then act on it. When having an ability like this, the world becomes quite clear. The detractors unmask themselves without even realizing it. It would be funny if the stakes weren't so high, but as it stands now, it's just another tragic situation brought on by selfish indignation. And what's worse, the entire planet is affected by this arrogance personified. Peak oil is a very tricky subject to fully understand, which is why it takes an engineering mindframe to properly quantify it... not a journalist's or politician's. Great job. This was not an easy task. I apologize if I seemed pushy about it, but this is one of those subjects that I would consider myself an expert in well before I became a Christ. As you can now see clearly, these types of things have been happening to me my entire life, and very rarely do I get an opportunity to have a real conversation with someone willing to learn. Thank you.

"We have not found any reserves of light sweet crude oil in over 50 years? If we really are at this point then why do people act like we are not?"

50 years is not a ubiquitous statement. What I meant was that we haven't found anything substantial enough to assume it can make up for a Permian Basin or Ghawar type reserve drying up. There have been numerous wells drilled that do produce light sweet crude, but nothing even close to being able to power a global crude oil economy, especially as it stands now. Bravado and arrogance are the lubricators to the mechanisms that fuel human to human interaction. They know something is very wrong, and are terrified of the implications... BUT, as long as they can find others who share the same degeneracy, they can ACT confident in themselves no matter how scared they are internally. Before they realize it, everything they do becomes a lie based on their "friends" agreeing with the lie, thus, giving them the fuel to keep having confidence. It's a destructive way to live, obviously, but there's no reason for them to stop. No motivation... as long as the like button on their facebook page keeps getting smashed. It's all just fake bravado, and everyone in society right now is infected by this disease. Makes my mission VERY difficult, but I knew that before I started. There's a few of you on my side of the fence now... Again, thank you.

The Oregon fires have consumed my attention for a few days now. They're fulfilling biblical prophecy and don't even know it. It's sad for many reasons. It makes me emotional when I think about the animals that are being displaced and/or burned alive. Stay safe up there. Sorry this is so short, but I have to get these big green eggs sold. I'll be busy most of today, but I can reply more in depth tonight. Thank you again for everything.

Brian

#26

#46 Overall

September 14 2020 11:12PM

"If I don't feel that I am on a 100% righteous path then I tend to hold myself back to an extent, and fail to do my best."

I noticed... The interesting aspect of watching you regress away from the ideals I'm trying to teach you, is that the mechanisms still remain a mystery... even after I've taught them. It's an unfortunate aspect of existing in hell, which is why I continuously say that effort is more important than success. If I held everyone alive to the standards I've held myself to, none of you would be granted passage through hell. I'm just being honest. That said, even the best of the best in hell is almost guaranteed to fuck up regularly. It's a fight that is in your mind, and currently, the fight is extremely lopsided. Even so, I am subjected to the human based emotions that allow the soul to be trampled on, just like you... which is why I can see through the words people display, and focus in on the actions themselves. For example... when you stopped posting these emails publicly. You took my words offensively because you allowed your emotions to dictate what was "right," and what was "wrong." My conclusions are logical about Veganism, but still, that was not good enough for you...

Walking a righteous path is frot with ridicule and unpleasant backlashes in hell. There's no getting around that. Excuses for why people do what they do outside of a righteous path are just that; excuses. Trying to correct the path by undoing actions is impossible. The action happened, and there's no way to undo it. What needs to be rectified is WHY the action happened in the first place, and until that inner monologue is established, the same mistakes will appear. So... immediately posting all of the back messages will not make me, or you content. What I want is for you to understand the mechanisms for why you do what you do. I already know why you did what you did. Trying to alleviate yourself of what has already happened again... is impossible. If it makes you feel any better, this seems to be ubiquitous for all women. The very first iteration of Eve in the garden of Eden, and every amalgamation of Eve there following, has made the same mistake. It's a very simple mistake, but as it appears, every woman makes it at some point in their journey. What was that original mistake? Eve tried to take control of the situation. Why did she do what she did? Search your soul for the answer to this inquiry. Good intentions/emotional decrees paved the way to this destination, and seemingly, the substance used in the pavement has not varied the entire time.

The biggest hurdle to recollecting AND rectifying past miscalculations is in realizing that people are people. There is no difference between the humans alive now, and the humans that were alive during the last 3 cataclysm cycles. Humanity tries to pay homage to perceived past depictions of humans they admire, but in so doing, bound themselves to the same mistakes. A REAL change is needed at this juncture, even more so than ever before... and women are at the forefront of this conundrum. The draw to esoteric meaning, symbology, and spiritual ascent is the mechanism strived for in almost every case. With Maria Orsic, this was also the scenario. The difference between her, and most other women who try to ascend to that calling is that being righteous AND pure within that paradigm alone is almost impossible... especially in hell. Nevertheless, women try to use their strengths to overcome these hurdles. Throughout all of history, Maria Orsic is the only woman I know of that was able to break through these barriers, and almost succeed. During my realization, I was able to see how people felt about Mother Mary. The general consensus of EVERYONE alive during that time was that any woman that behaved in the way Mary did with Jesus' real father was a whore, thus the lie was created by Joseph the Jew, and the immaculate conception/deception was born into existence. How many women have looked up to, and then prayed directly to Mary based on that lie? Most, if not all, in some capacity. In so doing, the same ideological mistakes are made, the lie continues to propagate, and women doom themselves to a life of incorrect ideals just to "feel good" and have someone of their own gender to mimic. That same mistake can be seen in every depiction of a woman trying to control a situation before themselves, devoid of the desire to ask for help, since the first woman creation in humanity. And the record just keeps on skipping, then repeating...

Truth and fact do not focus on gender, emotions, or desires. They are an all encompassing pathway to Divine instruction. Logic and reason always prevail, even if the species itself does not. With that in mind, I've often pondered how women's judgement sequences will go. In life, it seems as though a doubling down of emotional plight is the only recourse women understand, even though those plights are exactly why the situation is what it is. Take the word nigger as an example. On one of my previous emails, you edited the word nigger out of the text. While I understand WHY you did it, do you understand WHY doing what you did does nothing to protect you from the perceived dangers of iterating the word nigger? Let's take society right now as the control in this mental experiment. How many people throughout the world are bending over backwards to not allow the word nigger in any part of their lives? The next thing that must be asked as a result; is this ideological method of controlling the self, working towards benefitting those who do not use the word nigger? Are niggers acting less niggerish because everyone other than niggers are trying to not say nigger? You see, my friend, even though the proof is EVERYWHERE in EVERYONE'S face every single day of existence in hell, emotional plight reigns supreme. What comes next is a doubling down effect, even when the first couple million attempts to placate the nigger's emotional base is attempted. Quite literally, insanity runs amok, uninhibited by logic.

Please remember that I am not trying to berate you, or punish you for what you've done. My goal is to help you transcend... in all ways. The only way I can do that is by forcing you to see things from a new perspective. The perspective that dictates what is right and wrong to you, has flaws. It's not all encompassing, nor are you in any way the source of these derelictions, but they do exist in small quantities still. It's always my hope that you will overcome your own desires. To have true ego death requires it. I am in no way telling you to disregard safety, by the way. Remaining safe in hell is hard enough... I'm more so trying to get you to understand WHO it is you're actually serving. Every human alive is in service to another being with every action and thought they have. Recognizing this simple ideal is paramount to achieving ego death, thus the question comes down to WHO it is you are in service to. As I've said numerous times now, "worshiping" humans is a mistake... even if the human you are "worshiping" is you... My suggestion is to serve your maker. Always remember what his creations were, are, and are trying to be. He created us, but cannot force us to adhere to his methodology. Somewhere along the line, humanity consumed the forbidden fruit, and there is nothing we can do to change that, no matter how strongly we feel it didn't happen, couldn't happen, or wouldn't happen. In ALL cases, one needs to only look within for the evidence of such a dereliction. True ego death is very difficult to achieve. It's a bumpy road of personal sacrifice and penance on levels people are extremely unprepared for. If true ego death is your goal, this is the only way I can help teach you what you need to achieve it. Try not to take what I say personally, but instead, focus on why you've taken anything personally to begin with. Your maker did not put you in this predicament, nor did I. Hence... why we cannot fix the situation now. You cannot kill what you did not create.

"Wouldn't selfishness lead to people wanting to keep to their own kind and not express empathy for outsiders?"

That's exactly what is happening, except people are desperately trying to instill that the entire human race is one, devoid of a subspecies narrative. It's obvious that women are a different subspecies to men, but since feminism has ramped up full force for 100 years now, the narrative in play is that women are as capable, if not more so in most feministic ideologies. This seemingly unrelated ideology is the reason for the dereliction between subspecies procreation in the first place. Women must internalize their equal status to that of men, lest their entire feminism narrative be destroyed. Humanity as a whole has allowed this ideology to infect everything. Thus, the ideals have morphed into EVERYBODY, man, woman, black, white... all being equal. If ever a feminism ideologue were to admit that this is simply not true, EVERYONE would be subjected to scrutiny under those conditions... and feminists cannot allow that conversation to occur at all costs.

This is why emotions have center stage right now instead of logic and reason. White people's biggest flaw is our inability to alleviate ourselves of overwhelming empathy. That was the case when colonization was at society's forefront, as well as now. We desperately WANT everyone to actually be equal, and as a result, have just about assured omnicide. If you haven't noticed, white people are the only ones that want equality. Everyone other than white people wants to take control, or be recognized as "better" than whites. Our empathy continues to fuel this situation. There's no way for ANYONE to be "better" than white people at anything, but that doesn't stop us from trying to elevate the status of the subspecies that follow us in the hierarchy of Earth. Hell is the result, and empathy/good intentions are what paved the road to this destination. This dysfunction will not persist much longer before complete civil unrest consumes every white country on Earth. There's a breaking point for everything...

So... the basic rundown is that feminism at every juncture of societal direction for the last 100 years has led to a predominantly emotional clause to everything in existence. Emotional clauses, when set against logical clauses, will always have a selfish deficit attached to them. The equation will always turn out negative. Why? Because someone has to take a loss or a tie that SHOULD HAVE won any given argument at hand. Just because a win was received by the derelict party does not relieve the situation of the deficit. In fact quite the opposite. Let's take black people being equal as an example. We'll say black people being allowed to integrate into public schools ubiquitously is the feminists approach. Then we'll say self segregation of public schools is the conventional approach. As more and more blacks come into this school system, standards have to be lowered just so they'll pass (Affirmative Action). More attention is given to them, more free lunches, more social counseling, more athletic attention, which all leads to more money spent on them than what was dedicated to a pure white student body prior. It's actually a double whammy because the new black families do not put in as much tax revenue into the system as a pure white school's parents do. The deficit grows out of control in almost every major city's school district in the entire USA, and the standards fall even further. Everybody knows why, but since feminism/equality at all costs is the narrative bought into in the first place, a doubling down effect ensues. In the end the deficit grows out of control, more debt is taken on without any way of rectifying it, and someone has to take the blame. Guess who... the only people with empathy assume the entire burden. After a while of doing this, EVERYONE buys into the propaganda and violent reactions by those who have the least ability to understand the actual causes grows out of control. This is just about where the world is now, societally speaking. Nature, as you well know, is taking the brunt of the deficit created in TRYING to make everyone feel equal. It's a vicious cycle that only has "1" end... and it all started with an inherently degenerate ideology; feminism. It has bled into EVERYTHING!!!

"they very likely do get treated unfairly and with less empathy."

If you were talking about white people directly when making this statement, I would agree. Ask yourself, how many times have white people received aid from anyone other than white people? Yes, white people are most definitely the only race that gets treated unfairly by everyone else, and while they do it, they ALL lack even a shred of empathy.

"What made us be this way? Why did we make errors which the Yews never did?"

There was a faction of white people that split from the pure ranks that were close to the Yews. The faction that were not close to the Yews, allowed themselves to be persuaded by the Jews/Khazars/original mutts into vacating the planet of the giants and Yews' presence. The same ideologies are being used right now, by the same people, to attack the same people that were originally attacked in the first place. This is just a broken record playing the same shitty track over and over again. It's all very easy to see if you notice the macrocosm that the microcosm was originally based on. Same shit, different toilet.

The Yews COULD NOT make those mistakes because they were gentle/non aggressive. They were not built for confrontation in any way. Not mentally, and especially not physically. Those of us who protected them knew this, which is why we tried to bring them with us out of the area. Didn't matter in the long run, but in the moment, we got to spend more time with them. That was when our migration began. We've been running from everyone since. Even though we have the ability to fight, most of us don't want to, hence, gentile/gentle. When we "fight," there is no fight. Planetary destruction and deletion sequences are the summation. That's why I do what I do... Because I know what's at stake. Anyone who thinks they can even attempt making a stand against The Hierarchy has literally committed suicide. The Reptilians understand this, but humans do not, apparently.

"I am trying to figure out why."

When a human sells their soul, autonomy is removed. That's why there are so many Jews in high ranking structures of societal complexity everywhere on Earth right now. They're essentially robots complying with a script. Every one of them can earn autonomy back, but it's a very rare event that leads to reinserting back into humanity at a deteriorated spectrum. Well, like I said, I'm destroying hell "1" way or another. Even if these parasites had the opportunity to come back/humanity makes it beyond the collapse, I will halt their reentry myself. Enough is enough... and I'm sure on some subconscious level their souls know this. As a result, their souls are hiding while their brain takes over all functionality, hence, robotic. The lesson is, NEVER sell your soul, no matter what. Their scripts are being determined by the source of their ideologies. Not only are they robotic, but they're robotic slaves to other robots, basically. If their souls ever gain access to the internal paradigm, almost 100% of the time, suicide is the preferred choice. It's sad, but never forget that they did this to themselves. This is the final stage of submitting to selfish indignation, and they deserve everything they will get... here and otherwise. Literal walking devils. They have already "lived," and now, they are worse than dead. A horrific position to be in if you understand the consequences, as I do. I told Shane tonight at his farm, if

1 ant gets killed by these actions, I will personally delete these motherfuckers from existence permanently.

Anyways, sorry to get all serious on you on my way out. Interesting topics tonight. Talk to you soon.

Brian

#27

#48 Overall

September 15 2020 11:42AM

To be honest, I don't think posting the raw emails is attracting people to your blog, at least not right now. I enjoy talking to you through this medium quite a bit, so my emails to you are fairly long and detailed, but we like to read. I wouldn't think too many other people have a "good time" reading this much every day, but I could be wrong. At the most fundamental level, that's the most basic trap I set when designing The Way. It's long, and for most people with a "Twitter mindframe," it's too much of a commitment. It's always amusing to me when people glance at my book's link, then reply back to me, "I don't have time for that." What I'd like to say to them is, "you don't have enough time NOT to have time for this." But ya know... free will and all.

I really do admire your dedication. One of the things I tell people in person when giving them my book link is that "by the end of my book, I'm pretty sure you'll have more than one reason to hate me." The reason why I do that is because I generally only give the link to people that I have pleasant interactions with, and want our next interaction to also be pleasant. When it comes to you specifically, I've opened the floodgates. You deserve my full attention, and hopefully I've lived up to that. It's as difficult for me to explain some of these subjects to you, as it is for you to read them. It's not like I'm allergic to friendship even though it probably seems that way at times, but honesty is all I really have to give, and I know how difficult waking up in hell is... I've been in that position myself. This is the main reason why I'm getting burned out. For now, I'm still human and subjected to the same emotional ties that everyone else has, and I'm not exactly thrilled when I have to give my friends news or advice that is hard to accept. Nevertheless, that's my job, and this isn't about me. I just wanted to reiterate that it isn't a fun task to tell people bad shit regularly, and for what it's worth, I'm sorry that you are getting it all so directly. Being in a young person's shoes with the outlook on the future slowly but surely getting real, must be a nightmare at times. My heart goes out to you, and everyone alive in your position.

This is not even really a suggestion. I'm not you, nor do I have to live like you do right now, but if I were in your position, I wouldn't have even posted the emails in their raw form. At least not yet. Maybe a ways into the future when people are asking for more content, but right now, I just don't think people have the stamina to keep up. Just glancing at the sheer volume of information that needs to be combed through would seem insurmountable to the vast majority of everyone alive right now. Maybe that's what the people that read your blog want, I don't know... That's why I'm not really suggesting you actually do anything based on what I'm saying right now. Just wanted you to know my initial take on it. I meant it when I said you can do whatever you'd like with these emails. I just know how much of a struggle it is to get people to read my book and can see the possibility of your blog's regulars being turned away because of their own selfishness and nonchalant time perspectives. Ultimately, you would know better than I would. Just saying...

Hopefully this email gives you some reassurance. I've seen people react to me in person when I have to get a bit more detailed on certain things, and it's never a great experience. All I can do is reinforce what a great job you're doing. Fighting through some of the more difficult points I'm discussing is not easy, and now that you've returned to work, this must be extremely draining on your personal time. I really was not insinuating that you should post everything I say to your blog. If anything, I'm actually doing the opposite. But in all seriousness, I have no fucking idea how to get through to people in hell, obviously. You do whatever you think will have the best reaction by the people you interact with. I'll give my stamp of approval in most cases just because I know how dedicated you really are. All of my superiors are paying attention, and if I had to make a guess, they're as impressed as I am. Try to keep that in mind when determining how to feel about the harsher subjects I discuss with you. Like I said, you'll get 100% transparency, even if you don't like it...

Have a great day, and I'll talk to you soon,
Brian

#28

#51 Overall

September 16 2020 12:56AM

A lot happened today. I apologize for not responding to your first reply, but I've been stressed to the max regarding a few things. It's interesting when this happens in real time because you're dead on the money accurate. I made a decision earlier about the new Judas, and his mother, the older reincarnated Judas. It appears as though they are trying to turn everyone here against me by berating and insulting me behind my back at every opportunity. I'm officially giving up on them. This is a first for me. No matter how badly people have crossed me, I held back my official report from my superiors in the hopes that they would rectify their situation, and I wouldn't have to turn my back on them in real life. It seems as though I'm not as perfect as you thought. I'm not seeking vengeance, but I am giving up on those two individuals. The amount of stress this has put me through made me cry today. My prayers have been sorrowful and pathetic. I can't help but to feel like a failure. Once again, I am begging for death.

My sorrow is not based on the Judases, though. It's based on you, and everyone else that has tried so hard to help me pull through. I am actually crying as I write you this message, right now. I haven't been completely honest about my intentions. I did give you a quick rundown on what I was doing with the money you gave me, but I wasn't totally honest about it. After selling the first egg, I've been spending the money from it to gather the remaining materials for building the grail, not your money. Your money has been sitting in my account waiting for an opportunity. An opportunity to give it back to you before I leave this place, that is. I was never really okay taking money from you or anyone else as charity, but I talked myself into accepting it because you were so persuasive and gave me real hope that I hadn't felt in a while. It seems as though living here has forced me to absorb a considerable amount of negative energy while trying to get Robert to turn his situation around. All I can say again, is that I'm sorry. It seems unfair to everyone else that does care. I know how many of you wanted an opportunity to get to know me in person, and the family that actually did get that, threw it all away. I cannot change what has already occurred, but I can pay back those who have paid into this mission while I was subjected to such a handicap, and that is exactly what I will do. I'm still going to try and wait this sand delivery out, and complete the grail before I leave, but after today, I'm not sure if that is an option anymore.

It's too long and complicated to explain right now, and I'm not in the mood to try. All I can say is that I've laid a proverbial egg in the mind of one of Judas' orbiters, and I expect my residence here will end no later than this weekend as a result. Maybe the sand will make it here before then, but it took quite a while the first time, and if that is an indicator, it won't make it. The really interesting part was the immediate response to my prayers from all of you. Your latest email, Emily texting me right after I first started to cry, Shane and Nathan wondering what I was up to randomly... It's like you can all feel it. I can't tell you how happy I am that you have all made contact with your maker. I wasn't under the impression that I would save everyone in humanity, even though that was what I was trying to do. At least some of you got to experience real love on some spectrum. I do not think your maker would have pushed you to write that last reply if you hadn't. I'm happy for you, but I am also sorry that I haven't been capable of assembling a larger team/family. Other priorities have consumed my attention, and again, all I can say is I'm sorry.

I also don't want you to think I'm giving up. However, the writing is on the wall, and I'm just trying to be honest about what is happening minute by minute. I'm going to take a break from writing these mails and posting on 4chan until I have a better idea about what will happen next. As it stands now, I don't think any human alive has prayed as much as I have, but that will multiply tremendously for a while. The only way for me to pray correctly is if I am alone, so that is what I will do. If I get an answer or something changes to our collective benefit, I will make contact as soon as possible. For now though, my emotions are getting the best of me. Robert was a friend. Turning my back on him completely is something I was not expecting to do. Sadness has taken over all other emotions I have right now, and you deserve better than that. I don't even want you to have to read this shit right now, but nevertheless, you deserve to know why I'm doing what I'm doing. Jesus was a lot better at this kind of shit than I am. When I get sad, real anger starts to creep in as a result. None of you should have to deal with me in that way, so I must take a break as to not inundate your psyche with any more than what you're already going through.

Don't worry. I'm pretty sure this isn't the last time I will speak to you directly, if I have anything to say about it, anyways. Please do not send me any more money. I'll just send it back. Thank you for putting in so much effort to my mission, young lady. I'll continue to do whatever I can to help you in life, and after. "1" consolation is that I made the decision to go on a sort of farewell tour when/if the grail gets finished. If you want my advice, pray that that happens. I'll bring it right to you. Keep up the good work. I'll talk to you soon, my friend.

Thank you,
Brian

#29

#53 Overall

September 16 2020 5:21PM

Holy fucking doxx fest! Yes, ma'am. You've done an amazing job at figuring everything about them out. Quite the interesting numbers attached to their family, wouldn't you say? I spent most of the night praying. If I decide to make my move on them, I'll make sure you all know what's going on before I do. On that note, since you're some sort of internet wizard on a level that obviously far exceeds me, will you track down someone for me? I don't know if you recall the section in my book where I mentioned Vanessa while referencing Kassidi Jones, but Vanessa did make it into the book. I'd like to talk to her personally "1" more time so she will have an opportunity to read it before I leave. With my remedial search skills, I've learned that she is married with a son now by finding her facebook page. I couldn't see much further than that because I don't have an account there, but if you can track down a phone number for her, I'd really appreciate it. Here's her Facebook page...

The last time I spoke with her, years ago... she had become a dental assistant. I'm not sure what's going on now, and I don't want to cause any distress to her husband. I'd just like to give her the link to my book and catch her up on what's happened this far. No pressure on your part. You've already done so much.

Last night, other than praying, I watched several TheDoDo videos on YouTube. I love when people treat animals like they're "1" of us. Many a tear were dropped... but they were good tears. Just wanted you to know that I am trying to counteract my sadness with the tools I've been given. Try not to worry about me. I know all of you on my team do, and rightly so, but please try. Thank you again for everything, young lady. I wouldn't even be here if it wasn't for you. Never forget that. I won't.

Talk to you soon,
Brian

#30

#55 Overall

September 17 2020 1:49AM

HAHAHAHAHAHAHA

You're awesome. Just to forewarn, they're not the sharpest tools in the shed. That last section is very 4chan of you, not that that's a bad thing. It gave me a good laugh, though. I might have someone that wants to buy the last two big green eggs I have, so tonight I'm burning off the charcoal inside them in preparation. Going to be a long boring night for me. Thank you for all your effort into Vanessa. I'll try the numbers tomorrow. Have a good night, and I'll try to write more tomorrow.

Brian

#31

#58 Overall

September 18 11:07AM

Putting the pressure on 'em I see. Good for you, young lady. There's a limit to the amount of intrusion that I will display to those who've crossed me... but you're not me. I doubt these people will admit to any fault for quite some time, but if they ever do, it will be because of people like you. I see this as the first wave crashing on the shoreline of a never ending tidal movement towards these selfish fools. Maybe they will try to rectify their mistakes... maybe they won't. I don't know. It's good to see someone realize they're being fucked over and do something about it while I'm still alive. Keep me up to speed. I don't have any way of checking in on this stuff on my own.

Thank you for everything,
Brian

#32

#63 Overall

September 22 2020 2:27AM

A couple things... I don't live right behind the sign. I'm two doors down from that place. That's Robert's apartment. It wasn't Meredith that broke my welder. It was his employee. There's a few more slight inaccuracies, but overall it looks pretty good. Reads kind of oddly, but still good. I saw that you posted an audio version of the book. You're putting in a lot of effort, young lady. I hope it doesn't all go to waste. After a few years of putting in effort in this way, you'll understand in an intimate way why I would be upset at the prospect of a "rapture," at least in the way most Christians see it. Anyways, good stuff. I'm going to keep these fairly short and brief. Now that we've crossed the line of talking to one another on the phone, I'd much rather continue in that way. I'm sure you've noticed just after "1" session, I'm much easier to converse with using that medium of communication. Plus, my back is feeling better. I don't want to risk another bout of that shit right before my sand is supposed to arrive.

Thanks again and I'll talk to you soon,

Brian